NASA kicked off a series of forums to identify showcase and support innovative approaches to sustainability challenges. The new initiative is called launch, hosted by NASA's deputy administrator, Lori Garver. The first forum launched water is being held at NASA's Kennedy Space Center in Florida March 16 through 18. We have been maybe uniquely certainly in the government but but beyond as well the only folks who agree there was no such thing as waste water the things that you carry to space are absolutely critical weight is very important in the recycling water has been a very very large goal for us other launch partners include the US Agency for International Development the US State Department and Nike the water forum brings together 10 entrepreneurs from around the world who have proposed solutions to water shortages and 22 council members representing business policy engineering science communications and sustainability sectors