Flying saucer drops into a Russian park!

By NICHOLAS DAVIES, Foreign Editor

IT'S OFFICIAL comrades! Aliens have landed their spaceship in a Russian park.

In a typically-deadpan announcement, the Soviet news agency Tass revealed that the visitors from outer space were up to 12ft tall and had little heads.

They went for a short walk, but didn't stay long. And the three strangers had a small robot-like creature with them.

Shining

Tass says the extra-terrestrial tourists dropped in on the Soviet city of Voronezh, 300 miles south of Moscow.

"Scientists have confirmed that an unidentified flying object landed in a park," Tass disclosed.

"They have identified the site and found traces of aliens who made a short promenade around the park." The visitors arrived and left in a large, shining ball or disc which hovered over the park.

Onlookers, said Tass, were overwhelmed by fear that gripped them for days.

RED ALERT: He came from outer space..

Experts at the scene found a 60ft depression in the grass, four deep dents and two bits of unidentified red rock which "cannot be found on earth".

They apparently proved the story was true by a method of tracking which they called "biolocation".

Excitement

But Tass did not explain what on earth "biolocation" means.

Residents of Voronezh also reported recent sightings of a banana-shaped object.

The arrival of the lanky pea-heads has caused almost as much excitement as a previous story concerning a milkmaid and an alien in Perm in central Russia.

She swore that she met a man who was "taller than average, with short legs and had only a small knob instead of a head".
