One-man angry mob Paul MacInnes campaigns to stop martians emigrating to earth

We told music site guest editors Kaiser Chiefs that they could commission from a wide pool of Guardian writers, from Polly Toynbee to Jonathan Steele. "Well, what about that bloke we just met?" they said. "He seemed alright." And so it came to be that online entertainment editor and one-man angry mob Paul MacInnes was commissioned to write a spoof Daily Mail column from 2038 on how, were aliens to land on earth tomorrow, they'd probably campaign to have them deported ...

Now, don't get me wrong, I like martians as much as the next man. Some of my best friends are little green men. But while we're welcoming our far-flung friends through the front door, let's just be careful they're not nipping in over the garden wall and doing us from behind.

Ever since that flying saucer first crash-landed into Noel Gallagher's Primrose Hill mansion destroying his home, possessions and Beatles memorabilia (including his beloved Ringo wig), I've been eyeing up these visitors. Nice enough chaps, if you like your eyes boggling and your ears shaped like traffic cones. But it's another part of their martian makeup that concerns me. Excuse my Venusian, but have you seen what they're packing in their space pants?

Now I'm not normally one to be sizing up another fella's dangly bits (that incident in the toilets at the British press awards was an accident, I was looking for my keyring). But even I can't help but notice that your average martian is carrying something a little special down below. Forget Linford's lunchbox, this is the spaceman's suitcase – and it ain't stuffed full of spare socks neither.

Friends of Gary the Green Man might insist he only uses his magic hose to pull petrified pussies out of trees. But I think we all know the saying: the bigger the green hose, the more grass it waters. So, for want of a better phrase, I think these guys should put a knot in it. Keep it away from our lady folk. Because our lady folk don't like it (not that I've asked, but they're hardly going to want to curl up with a six-foot tall, superbly muscular and verbally dextrous alien whose manhood is the size of East Anglia, are they?)

So here's what I want to say to Barry the Martian. Watch it. Because Big Mac is watching you (that's me, by the way) and if I catch you anywhere near anything that smells nice and looks lovely in a dress I will, personally, put you on the first spaceship back to the red planet, and you won't need your passport stamped because you'll have the imprint of my size seven and a half on the seat of your spacesuit.

END NOTE: Paul MacInnes disappeared from planet earth just six days after filing this article from his luxury penthouse suite. The cause of his disappearance remains unclear, though witnesses report seeing the columnist wearing a frilly, flowery flock and slowly disappearing into a bright white light.
