

MARTY WILDE

His spare time is spent playing with the kids, watching TV or reading about flying saucers.

"If I miss Tonight it wrecks my evening. The BBC's better than those people in white shirts on commercial TV—ought to be in Mme. Tussauds, the lot of them.

"No, these flying saucers is what I'm interested in. I believe in them. Mind you, I'm no fool. A lot of it's a load of how's your father. I don't believe everything, but somewhere in those millions of galaxies, there must be conditions that give life, a much higher life than we know.

"I have this theory that Christ was a sort of space man, not in a plastic suit or space helmet or anything, but a superior person, much better than we could be in a thousand years.

"I believe in God and all that, but that's what I think. And I also think that when God told Adam not to eat fruit off that tree what he really meant was: don't play about with nuclear fission."
