

The saucer men say: ban the bunfights

Evening News Reporter

Research groups are being urged to organise flying saucer expeditions—discreetly, and with no bunfights.

An editorial in the Flying Saucer Review suggests a number of good places for sighting UFOs — Unidentified Flying Objects.

They include the area around Heathrow Airport, the Chiltern Hills, the Lake District, the Pennines, and the wild mountainous country of South Wales.

"Any such expeditions should be organised quietly and without advance publicity," the editorial urges.

"The bunfight and barbecue atmosphere at some recent assays at field work leaves much to be desired."

The editorial continues: "It would be an advantage if police officers, members of the Observer Corps, Service officers, and other reliable and trained observers could be invited as witnesses once it is established that the chosen area is subject to Unidentified Flying Object activity.

LEARN STARS

"There is every chance that a discreetly organised watch in the early hours, over a period of days, could reveal the presence of hitherto unsuspected 'unlit' objects, often low over the ground.

"It is essential that, during daylight hours, researchers should become conversant, without fuss, with those places in their chosen locality where man-made lights may be expected at night.

"They should also learn their star maps, in case there is a clear sky. For reasons that should be obvious, they should act throughout the exercise with discretion."
