

JET HUNTS

THING

WITH

KNOBS ON

EVERYBODY saw it, hovering there in the sky above Madrid. A pyramid-shaped object. With knobs on.

The Thing caused traffic jams as thousands of Spaniards stopped their cars to stare at its three bright knobs of light.

To find out exactly what it was, the Spanish Air Force ordered the pilot of an F-104 jet: "Follow that Thing."

He chased the object up to 50,000ft. Then, with the Thing still high above him, he had to give up. His fuel was running out.

Perhaps (said usually well-informed observers) the Thing will now turn up in Argentina, where a flying saucer convention appears to be going on.

Prosecute

People there claim to have seen "squadrons" of flying saucers hurtling around the place. A housewife has admitted that a man from outer space visited her.

Another wife complained that a bald, ear-less man with "a phosphorescent stare" was prowling her grounds.

In Buenos Aires, police denied reports that two spacemen had been arrested after a car hit their badly parked saucer.

Six hundred miles away, in Mendoza, police were denying stories that five midget "humanoids" had held up two casino workers and taken blood samples from their fingertips.

They warned that anyone spreading "unwarranted fear" about flying saucers will be prosecuted.
