Geoge Carlin:

Controversial comedian, actor, and author George Denis Patrick Carlin was born on May 12, 1937 in New York City. George was raised by his mother, Mary, who left the father when he was two months old. He attended parochial school and was a altar boy, to which he credited his avowed atheism by the the time he reached adulthood. Mary was a secretary and devout C-tholic, and his father, Patrick, was a national advertizing manager for the New York Sun.

At fifteen he had quite enough schooling and dropped out of school in the ninth grade. He also developed a pattern of running away from home on a regular basis, thanks to a contintuous relationship with his mother, and he enlisted in the US Airforce in 1954, at the age of seventeen, seemed like a good idea at the time. He was stationed at Bossier City, Louisiana, trained as a radar technician, earned his high-school equivalency, and, moonlighthted as disc jockey on KJOE radio in nearby Shreveport, on the downside, he also received three court-martials and several disiplinary punishments, was declared an "upproductive airman," and was discharged in 1957.

While working at KXOL Rado in Forth Worth, Texas, George met co-worker Jack Burns, and the two of them formed a comedy team, refining that act at a coffehouse called the Cellar before moving to Los Angeles in February 1960. Calling themselves the "Wright Brothers," they hosted a morning show on KDAY Radio -----.

(JW Now I'll skip down to where Carlin wakes up on the the other side of life.)

I wish you could have seen the look of shock on George's face when he emerged from the tunnel and discovered there is really life after d-ath after all. And when he found his first wife Brenda waiting to greet him, he was stunned into a long silence while he held her, which I'm told he gaped at the hundreds of s-irits and animals who gathered to the reunion and said, "I'll be da-ned." George is an excellent example of the fact that atheists are embraced on the Other Side as surely as the most devoutly r-ligious, and with his humor, self-honesty, and misguided but honorable intentions, he tried to live a g-dly lifetime, no matter what words he used to define it.

(JW I'll try to continue this at a later time.)
