Don't look now but I think the Rapture didn't happen as the man said it would. Here's some information from a person who talked about that subject.

The End Of The World - Not Now, Not Ever

While end of the world "doomsday" predictions have occurred many times over thousands of years (even before the Bible was written), this latest one may have been the most infamous and publicized of all. Just two weeks ago, Christians around the world waited in eager anticipation for an angry God to punish the wicked of this world, while the good Christians were safely 'raptured' off to Heaven.

Harold Camping, the 89-year-old radio preacher from Oakland, California, gained international fame with his dire prediction that the Christian rapture would occur on Saturday, May 21. When that day came and gone without incident, he recalculated the doomsday scenario to occur on October 21 instead. When that day ends without incident, it may get extended again, or he may just fade away into obscurity. But he wasn't the first to make such claims and he won't be last.

These predictions of the destruction of Earth and the subsequent deliverance of the righteous will always be inaccurate because the basic premise is wrong concerning the nature of the divine hierarchy, the spiritual evolution of incarnated beings, and the purpose of our Earth and other third dimensional planets. Yet these ideas (and other false premises) are so firmly imbedded into the minds of so many people around the world, that only time and the certain failure of these events to unfold will convince 'believers' that they may have been mistaken.

And it's not just the Christians who are expecting to be rescued from a degenerating planet. There are numerous religions that teach some form of divine intervention in human affairs. And there are even many 'New A-ers' that expect some type of ascension departure or a rescue from a fleet of space vessels filled with friendly aliens.

While the Holy Beings of Light do seek to influence our behaviors in positive ways through various methods (on this planet as well as others), there are strict rules against direct intervention unless it's considered critical to the survival of the planet (such as an all out nuclear exchange between countries). What is in place is the law of karma, which dictates that we reap what we sow, as individuals, families, nations and the planet as a whole.

Also, the Earth itself is much too important in the overall plan of creation to allow it to be devastated to the point where the planet is uninhabitable. People will be incarnated on the Earth many millions of years yet, so it's not going anywhere as far as the Holy Ones are concerned.

So while there will indeed be many planetary changes and challenges, and 2012 is most certainly a key benchmark point in Earth's history, the planet will not be destroyed because an angry God seeks to punish us, or even due to the close proximity of an orbiting planet closing in on us.

What we should be doing is preparing ourselves by growing in the Light, and in our love for ourselves and others. Only then can we evolve to the level that would enable us to ascend to the next spiritual plane.

Surviving the Challenges of a Changing Earth

Perhaps the one belief that everyone can share and agree with, whether they be spiritual or secular in their outlook, is that the Earth is going through some very challenging times, which will undoubtedly cause its seven billion inhabitants to experience massive and life-altering changes in the years ahead. These changes can often be both sudden and severe, unimaginable consequences.

Whether it be the terrible disaster in Japan, the numerous tornadoes sweeping the midwest of the Uni-ed States, or the terrible, anticipated earthquakes yet to occur, many lives are being turned upside down. And combined with the increase in a-med conflicts, the global economic disaster, and anticipated food and water shortages, people in the know are wondering just how bad it's all going to get.

From strictly a secular viewpoint, it's going to get really bad! But from a spi-itual perspective, there has never been a time in the history of our planet, when so many have had the opportunity to progress so far in their spi-itual development!

It's not what happens to us and around us that matters, but rather how we react to what is happening. The -oly Ones of the Light fully expect the next few decades to be a time of unprecedented spirit-al growth for the people of this planet. People will learn to grow in love for themselves and love for others in new and remarkable ways. We have much to look forward to in the years ahead.

(JW This information came from the Agents Of Light. Of course we have to realize that we normally have super-novas that destroy planets and complete solar systems but they are then used to make up new planets and suns.)
