This talks about flying people.

My pet cat was also acting strangely, his eyes seemingly following something or someone who was not there. At other times he would awaken out of a sound sleep with a jolt; focusing on one part of the room blinking in curiosity. I eventually smudged my house with a sage stick and the activity abruptly stopped. Could it have been that my strong feelings and thoughts about this man enticed his sp-rit to me? Or perhaps another random entity I picked up on the information highway that day? Who knows. I firmly believe that the human mind is even more powerful than we realize, and that those on the other side can tune into that power.

So I'll ask again: Do you believe that it's possible a spi-it can haunt a person via the internet? I do.

'P-ychic Kindergarten' Teaches How to Explore Ps-chic Abilities

Long before J.K. Rowling ever conceived Hogwarts, a small group of students in Berkeley, Calif., were learning what Harry Potter would have called "divination."

It's called "psy-hic kindergarten," beginner lessons for cla-rvoyants, where they learn how to read colored sp-rits, feel chakras and "blow roses." Susan B-stwick, the president of the Berkeley Ps-chic Institute, is also one of its teachers.

"What we do is teach people to discover, go in and find out what your abilities are, and how do you want to use them for the greater good," she said.

Bo-twick stressed that, unlike Harry Potter and his friends, what she and her students are practicing is not m-gic.

"We talk about ma-ic and mi-acles, [but] it's allowing yourself to have what you're experiencing in life as a mira-le," she said. "I'm teaching people to use their psyc-ic ability. They already have it."

The institute, which is an offshoot of the C-urch of the D-vine Man, is a new a-e re-igious group, which bases its teachings on the Bi-le's New Testament and has been around for 38 years. It has had 300,000 participants come through, according to Bos-wick.

When the students are asked to "blow roses" in "ps-chic kindergarten," it means they are being asked to imagine a rose as a way of focusing the mind. In their minds' eye, they then visualize the rose exploding, which is supposed to clear their thoughts, getting rid of any distracting ps-chic energy.

The students also spend time talking about colors of ps-chic energy. Each of the colors has different meanings. For example, gold means sp-ritually awakened or inspired.

"In kindergarten, you're just there to play and learn and discover," said Bingo Ma-asigan, director of the Berkeley Psy-hic Institute. "That's what we do here. We provide the space. It's a playground for you to play with energy."

After graduating from the institute, the participants use their skills in many different fields. One is a clair-oyant debt counselor; another, a self-styled ps-chic hairdresser. Another, named Nysa, lives near Napa Valley, Calif., where she reads people's a-ras -- the psy-hic energy that surrounds our bodies in vivid colors.

Places, such as a house or an apartment, also can have aur-s from the ps-chic energy people have left behind. A group of psych-c h-alers from the institute now work in real estate conducting "house hea-ing," at the request of a real estate agent. They clear the rooms of any negative energy left over from the previous owners.

Real estate agent Luis Castillio-M-noz says he uses the he-lers purely to help houses sell. He had them come to one house where the former tenants were out of work and couldn't afford to pay the rent for six months.

"It's my business, so if I want to sell a house, you put energy in, energy comes out," he explained. "We'll do whatever it takes to get it sold."

However, the house in question still hasn't sold.

Bo-twick said that part of what they teach in "psy-hic kindergarten" is how to put the disappointments of life in perspective because they believe there is more reality than people can see.

"Learn to be amused by the things around you," she told her class. "When you're amused, the problems tend to get a lot smaller."

- STRANGE CREATURES FROM TIME AND SPACE DEPARTMENT -

Unsolved: Flying Humanoids
By Stephen W-gner

Astonishing accounts of "people" who fly - with wings or without.

Monsters and unusual creatures of almost every description have been reported over the centuries. From dinosaur-like animals to fairies to bizarre hodgepodes like the Jersey D-vil, there seems to no limit to the variety of unexplained creatures people claim to have seen with their own eyes. One of the most curious types of sightings - and quite rare - are those of human-like beings that fly. "Human-like" because in most respects they look like us, except that they have wings. In most cases, these odd creatures are not assumed to be either a-gels or d-vils (as traditional depictions have them as human-like beings with wings), but as something else. Something quite unusual.

Brooklyn Batman. Over 100 years ago, a man named W. H. Smith told the New York Sun that he saw a "winged human form" flying over Brooklyn, New York on September 18, 1877. Just about three years later, there were multiple reports from Coney Island, Brooklyn, of a man with bat-like wings flying overhead at approximately 1,000 feet. The man was flying toward the New Jersey coast, witnesses told the New York Times, and that he bore a "cruel and determined expression" on his face.

Wingless An-el. It's easy to dismiss such sightings as misidentified birds or a-cohol-induced illusions when one or two people report them. When as many as 240 people, however, attest to seeing the same thing, the reports are far more difficult to discount. Such a sighting look place over several of days in June, 1905 in Voltana, Spain. The accounts consistently described a woman dressed in white flying through the air - without the aid of wings. The woman sometimes flew against the wind, and one woman said she might have heard it singing as it passed overhead.

Flying Robot. It was the winter of 1936 in the Pavlodar region of Kazakhstan in what was then the U.S.S.R. when this sighting took place. Mrs. E. E. Loznaya was a 15-year-old girl then, and one day as she was walking to school on a quiet road, her attention was caught by a strange figure above her. Flying quickly across the sky was a man-like figure dressed completely in black. Despite its speed, the girl was able to see and describe it clearly. He was "of medium height and his black clothes covered him completely, like overalls," she said. It made a rumbling noise and appeared to her to be wearing a helmet of some kind, had a black surface where the face should have been, and wore a "rucksack" on its back.

Russian Legend. There had been legends of a flying man in the Soviet Union, but not quite like the one described above. Hunters around the Sikhote Mountains near Vladivostok claimed to have come across prints of a barefoot human that ended abruptly, as if he had taken off into the air. Such a creature was actually seen by writer V.K. Arsenyev in July, 1908. "I saw the mark on the path that was very similar to a man's footprint... then something rushed about nearby trampling among the bushes. Then I stooped, picked up a stone and threw it towards the unknown animal. Then something happened that was quite unexpected: I heard the beating of wings. Something large and dark emerged from the fog and flew over the river."

Brazilian Birdmen. In the early 1950s, a couple was taking an evening stroll near their home by the sea at Pelotas, Brazil. When two fast-moving shadows crossed their path, they looked up to see what they at first thought were two enormous birds flying about 30 feet above the ground. It was soon evident to the couple that these were not birds at all when the two flying creatures descended vertically and landed not far away. It was then clear that they looked like men, standing about six feet tall. Discovering they were being watched by the couple, the two "birdmen" squatted close to the ground, as if trying to hide. The female half of the couple convinced her husband to leave - and quickly.

Mad Inventors? Several people saw a flying man over Chehalis, Washington on January 6, 1948. Bernice Z-ikowski was one of them. She was soon joined by some schoolchildren who asked to come into her garden to get a better view of the aerial mystery. The man, in an upright position, was hovering just 20 feet above her barn, she estimated. He was apparently kept aloft by long silver wings that were strapped to his body. He seemed to have controls of some kind on his chest, which he worked to maneuver himself with a lot of whizzing noise.

A strikingly similar case was reported eight years later in Falls City, Nebraska. On a fall afternoon in 1956, "John H-nks" saw a winged creature flying only about 15 feet above the ground. Its wings were like shiny aluminum and had multi-colored lights running along their underside. The wings, spanning 15 feet, were clearly attached to the man by means of a shoulder harness. This flying man also had some kind of control panel affixed to his chest, and he manipulated the dials as he flew. This sighting could be attributed to some remarkable invention if not for the witnesses description of the flying man himself: leathery wrinkled skin, large watery blue eyes and a face that was "very frightening, almost d-monic." The witness also attested that he was paralyzed as this "man" flew over.

In April 1948, in the city of Longview, Washington, two witnesses saw no fewer than three helmeted men flying around in a similar manner. The witnesses could see no motors or propellers, yet it seemed to them that they could hear motor-like sounds. (It's worth noting the similarity of these last three accounts to ultralight aircraft or hang gliders; but of course, they hadn't been invented yet.)

Flying Man Returns. In 1952, Sinclair T-ylor, a young soldier on guard duty at Camp Okubu near Kyoto, Japan, likewise saw a flying thing he first thought was a bird. As it came closer and hovered above him, the guard could distinguish that it had a man's body that, if he were standing, would be seven feet tall. Its wingspan was also estimated at seven feet. Feeling threatened, he fired at the being with his rifle, but whatever it was had vanished. Strangely, when the guard reported the incident, his sergeant revealed that another guard had a similar experience the previous year.
