Subject: DK Experiences Of Being Controlled. Part 3. Nov. 20, 2011.

Here DK explains some of the time he was in a mental hospital.

The important thing is not what he did as he went out, but what impression it would leave on me, that he did that as soon as I had been saying something. But stayed for much longer time when I remained silent. I am not sure that the personnel at the mental hospital were controlling this guy, but I am sure somebody was and I think the reason for arranging it, was to intimidate me from talking to people about my experiences and hence to isolate me. Only recently, did I learn that this sort of 'therapy' was apparently used in the Korean w-r against A-erican prisoners of wa-, and I beleive it was referred to as the learned helplessness model or something. The prisoners were encouraged to inform on each other and this made everyone stop communicating with the others until they became totally isolated, just as effectively as if they had been forced into isolation.

A few days earlier, when I had been under constant surveillance, everywhere I went in the city, I had the impression that there was something odd about some of the surveyors. They seemed detached, had expressionless faces in a manner, that seemed in need for an explanation. Maybe they were just bored or maybe they had been instructed to look like robots, or maybe they had been d-ugged? I mean unknowingly, they may have been given some dr-g. It is no s-cret that large numbers of am-rican soldiers have been given dru-s unknowingly, for experimental purposes. I dont know, but some of the guys I saw that day, in the beginning of july 1992, looked a bit like zombies to me. I am not sure this is important, though.

When I had newly arrived at the mental hospital, I noticed that the surveyors continued to march on the fields outside the hospital. They were spread out evenly (which never happens when people are walking independently, in which case there will always be more fluctuations in the flow of people) clearly proving that this was an organized operation. There was absolutely nothing useful they could do in that surrounding other than just walk aimlessly. I beleive this marching had the purpose of creating a paranoic athmosphere.

I didn't stay long at the mental hospital and after I left, I temporarily broke my habit of taking long nightly walks, but a few months later, as I tried to exercise my human rights, by switching back to my old habit, their organized madness broke loose again. They often had people actually following me on the floor above or seemingly so, because it turned out, they sometimes just produced the sounds inside my head. It seems their rationale would be to show you that you are under constant surveillance, by following you above your head as you're moving in your apartment. Getting you used to that paranoic athmosphere, they may then gradually switch over to using the brain implant for producing sounds that very realistically mimic such surveillance, and that nobody else can hear. And this way they can phase out the costly part of the operation that requires a lot of people taking part and if you tell somebody about the surveillance you will be treated like a schizophrenic. Any psychiatrist would be happy to 'explain' it to you. I never talked to anyone about it since it was pretty obvious that they were deliberately trying to create a framework that would lend itself to a psychiatric explanation. And they would go to great lengths to achieve that end. Remember, their aim is to control people, while keeping the whole operation plausibly deniable. You could well ask how much the tax payers are paying for keeping such operations alive.

I remember a period more then two years after the whole thing began, when they became a little careless and used an identical sound recording repetetively, so there wasn't any natural variation in the surveillance imitations.

In 1992, when there was intensive surveillance going on and when I would be accompanied by a stream of people every time I left my home, they had all these people activated anyway, so there wouldn't be much additional trouble having them do a little extra door slamming above me and making other synchronized signs of surveilling me. In the long run, it would however be much more cost effective to simulate it through the implant.

They produced sounds directly into my brain to give me the impression that my neighbors would be surveying or harassing me long after the real surveyors had left. There were also much more subtle types of influence acting on me. E. g., simultaneous with the production of threatening sounds seeming to be emanating from a neighbor, there was a kind of suggestive effect at work. Such as to make me fear my neighbors or inducing anger directed towards them. It felt like something coming from without and I never could mistake it for a genuine feeling, but such things are so subtle, that you tend to repress the thought of it, for the usual fear of being suspected of suffering from some kind of insanity.

The use of both the oldfashioned type of surveillance and harassment, is using ordinary people or police officers, and in addition, using the electronic mind-control technology, is not only aimed at the victim, but in addition, it is also a way to cover up the high-tech operation, since the guys in the low-tech operation may think they are the only ones in action. I will not elaborate on it here.

I also noted that there seemed to be a slight anomaly, regarding the vehicles they used for part of the surveillance. There seemed to be an anomalously high fraction that had the same color. I thought that they had hired the cars and that they had been given some bargain price if they accepted a limited choice of colors. Normally I would never mention this, since it would seem to divert the attention from more important matters, but I have seen some other mind-control victims, who have made similar observations. And they seem to be ridiculed for suggesting that somebody would take the trouble of deliberately arranging this sort of subtle anomaly. Long after the event, I have been thinking that maybe they did it as a kind of psychological warfare tactics and that it wasn't just because they happened to hire cars more cheaply. Here is how they might reason: By arranging that the target of the surveillance is exposed to a lot of little anomalies like the one mentioned, the person may be tempted to keep records of everything, as proof. This will redirect the persons attention and energy from concentrating on those facts that seem more threatening to the surveyors, namely to note what they look like and maybe finding out their identities. In a sense, what they could hope to accomplish, by doing it would be to raise the noise level, to blur everything. To make the person devote a lot of time just to keep track of insignificant details.

When I was under intensive surveillance, it was at times so irritating, that I would have liked to give some of those surveyors a good beating, but being basically a very nonviolent nature, I never really came close to doing that. And besides, I thought that the mind controllers would have loved that, maybe they would have offered such a beaten surveyor, to sign a security oath, whereafter he would have been given the opportunity of retaliating directly into my brain. Those are not fair conditions, and in general, I don't recommend anyone to use violence against the states perpetrators.

More importantly, the surveyors are just the people at the bottom of the hierarchy.

Since I had now been connected with psychiatry once, I was expecting that they would try to use that somehow. For instance by trying to arrange some kind of new breakdown, preferably fitting into some established psychiatric diagnosis.

Such as cyclic psychosis. A very useful one, that diagnose. Since it is cyclic, it's not there all the time, explaining why most people don't think you're crazy. But everytime you claim that some state perpetrators are after you it's just another cycle of the psychosis. In my case they decided a cycle of three years would be suitable. I was in a different city then. One night, as the lightning struck in the nearby forest, with a fairly strong effect reaching into the room, where I was sleeping, they used that as a suitable starting point for a torture session, worse than anything they had done for a long time, and mimicking the breakout of some kind of psychosis attack.
