This shows how the past can be changed.

She immediately becomes frightened. She rushes over and grabs her son, as the bottle falls from his hand, spilling on the hay, and drags him out of the barn. He becomes loud and disrespectful, trying to get loose from her grip. She tells him that her grip is nothing compared to what could happen to him if he is caught by the masters of the house. She does not let go of him, by now, literally dragging him behind her.

He decides that he better be quiet and somehow he manages to get back on his feet, humbling himself, walking beside his mother with her help. It takes them a little longer to get back to their room, so that no one can see them. They successfully creep back into the house, and she sits him down on his bed and once again explains to him what could happen, leaving out no details about what happened to his father, telling him it could be the same if he does not change his ways.

The next day, Dolly has another conversation with Jo, and he makes promises that he will not sneak off or steal anymore. She begs him to keep his promise, and they go about their duties of the day.

Next we see Jo at age 16. He is not very happy and feels that there has to be something more in life than staying around, helping his mother. He had made many promises to her that he would not do anything that would get him into trouble, when he was 14. He has done well, but recently he had been spending time with a group of young men who were his age and they were not the best type of persons he could choose for a friend.

His mother tried to help him understand that he does not have to be like everyone else. She wanted him to be thankful for what they were given, because they were fortunate enough to live in a home with a room of their own, and many other slaves did not live inside of their master's living quarters. They always have food and their masters treated them better than most, but she always had a fear that one day Jo would do something to go against the trust of the masters and her by breaking his promises.

Jo began to spend more time away as he had previously done. Dolly questioned him and he denied that he was doing anything wrong. She reminded him of the consequences he may face should he do anything illegal and against their owners. Dolly was sleeping soundly one night when she was suddenly awakened by loud voices and commotion. People were screaming, "Find him, get him now!" And her heart sunk into her stomach. She felt sick. She knew in her soul that they were looking for Jo. She quietly came out of her room, so as not to appear alarmed, and asked her master if there was anything she could do to help. She was told that someone had stolen

all of the moonshine from the house as well as a large sum of money, and she wanted to know if Dolly knew where Jo was at the time.
Dolly told her that she did not know where Jo was, that she did not believe that he would do such a thing. "Please, please, bring my son home to me! Please don't hurt my son! We slaves are supposed to be freed soon. Please understand that he is just a boy. I cannot lose my son, and be alone." The master's wife told her it was out of her control, and he should have known better, because this had gone on for too many years. He was just very lucky he had not been caught sooner.
The master and other servants left the home to look for Jo and his friends.
They came across the barn where they had been going to for three years. Buried beneath the hay, was many bottles of alcohol as well as large sums of money that had been stolen. The boys were not in the barn, and the reason they had not been caught sooner was this barn had not been used productively for many years.
The master gave orders to find the boys. They were found hiding nearby a lake just below the barn. After capture, Jo and his three friends were given no mercy.
Due to the fact that they had been doing these things for more than three years, there was no leniency. They were taken immediately into custody and the very next day
at dusk, they were put up in trees, and sadly they were hung for all to see, hoping to teach others a lesson.
Sadly, a short time after, Jo's mother was freed from being a slave. And had he kept his promises to his father and mother, he would have been freed as well.

Intervention results

We see Jo at the age of 14, and he is helping his mother with her chores around the house. He is very helpful, wanting to keep his promise to his father, to always be there and care for his mother.
Jo rarely ventures away from the plantation and if he does, he only does so with the permission of his mother, always letting her know where he is and who he is with.
He is terrified of doing anything that could cause him to get into trouble
his master.
He knows that eventually the day will come that he and his mother will be set free.
And he looks forward to the day that he can have his own family and raise his own children in a free world.
When Jo is nearly 17 year old, his mother and he are told that they are going to be given special papers that say they are no longer bound to their masters.
She also said that they may leave and are now free. Their masters are kind and give them a good sum of money to go out and begin a life on their own.
Jo eventually meets a beautiful young woman who was raised very similarly, having lost her father at a very young age. They were married when he was 18 and had two boys at a very young age. They were very happy throughout their years together.
Jo lived to be 62 years old, and di-d from a respiratory problem.
