A statue of Robert E. Lee stands atop a 60-foot column in Lee Circle.

Lee Stands in New Orleans

Even in a city of monuments, the memorial dedicated to Robert E. Lee stands out in New Orleans.

Atop a 60-foot marble column, the statue, which is dramatically lighted at night, depicts Lee standing with arms folded, looking out over the city.

The statue that anchors Lee Circle is a familiar landmark to local residents. Passengers who ride the St. Charles Avenue streetcars pass by it on their way through the Garden District, Audubon Park, and Tulane University.

Jefferson Davis, Gen. P.G.T. Beauregard, and many other friends of Robert E. Lee were present when the memorial was unveiled in 1884—the year of the New Orleans' industrial and cotton centennial exposition.

Alexander Doyle, a young sculptor from New York, designed the monument. The bronze figure of Lee is 16½ feet tall and weighs 7,000 pounds. Doyle also did the city's memorial for General Beauregard, the "Great Creole" of the Civil War who gave the command to fire on Fort Sumter.

Before the Lee memorial was erected, Lee Circle was called Tivoli Circle, and it was originally planned to be a garden surrounded by a canal. The circle was one of the focal points of a plan devised in the early 1800's by Barthelemy Lafon for the area now called the Lower Garden District. Lafon gave his streets names like Iope, Melpomene, and Thalia, after Greek muses.

Lee Circle is located at St. Charles and Howard Avenues.
