2. (S/NF/SK) The target was the South Seas coral atoll of Bora Bora. Called the "Pearl of Polynesia", it's history dates back to the British Admiralty and the famous Captain Cook. The circular atoll is characterized by its steeply towering mountains often shrouded in clouds and its distinctive circular and treacherous coral reef. The island is completely surrounded by this reef and there is only one deep draft entry. There is a small airstrip used by residents of nearby island, especially Tahiti, to visit the island.

3. (S/NF/SK) Source correctly identified a round land/water interface with "water hitting against the land" and rising, green hills, all of which is an extraordinarily accurate description of the small atoll and the effect of the surf against the coral reef. The descriptors then seemed to flit back to the late 1700s as Source began describing the presence of an object in the water, "floating up, people "involved" (on board?), big, (things that are) white, soft, rounded, " and the concepts of "hooking and latching ("lashing" of ropes or lanyards ?). Later the concept of, "ropes, strings, twinings, roping", were described. The men here were described as, "rugged, prepared, (doing) rugged work, "they know what to do". These men did not, "move toward the land, don't travel out, stay put", as would be expected of sailors who, history tells us, were unable to find the opening in the reef that would permit Cook's ship, "The Endeavor", to enter the "protected" harbor. Ironically Source frequently used the word, "protected" in her descriptives. Source further described a man (CPT Cook ?), as being, "young, intelligent, responsible", and intent on working with, "maps, charts and reading". The site, in the time period viewed by Source had been a, "beautiful area, once known for bringing in people, trading, "bartering" (unusual archaic term), but not now". The area is now, according to Source, peaceful, calm and secluded with activities (people ?), "brought in but then they leave", which again is an accurate description of Bora Bora's main attraction today - tourism.

OK - Return now to your sanctuary

At first I felt I came to a dark massive black area with land and water. I felt that men were brought to this to work.

The area was dirty and I felt there was a large structure in the water and men worked in the water. The men were rugged men. I felt the area was remote and isolated. I felt a reflection of the water and even though there it was a dirty area, I felt a shiny light or reflection around the structure in the water.

Now, I then felt ropes or strings of some sort. Latching. I felt a soft big-like balloon rising from the structure.

I felt at one time I was in a tunnel or looking down a tunnel but I saw nothing.

I then saw a man reading, cheating, mapping. He pointed to the land or up.

I then felt I saw the men again dressed differently and I sensed some people watching a show. The area looked more bright & was more lively.

I was sensing eagle flying, soaring.

rising
a hollow effect
