SUMMARY OF INFORMATION

The site is a wide open spacious area. There is an object or a structure here that crosses. People stand behind this object. There are smaller objects here. They are triangular in shape and they move across and up. These smaller triangular objects have an energy force behind them. The smaller triangular objects did not move downward however. Sometimes these small triangular objects open up. There was a large circular object here and it also moved back and forth. This large circular object was bright or it was light.

There is enjoyment at the site. Some people here are serious minded and some people find much interest here. There is history or culture here. Something is being accomplished based on a past tradition. It seemed as though demonstrations were going on here. There is studying on "know how" which comes from the past. The placement of objects seem to be very important. Sometimes it is busy at the site and sometimes it is very quiet and nothing is here. The site can be harsh. People move in and out. Men are not dressed in normal clothes.

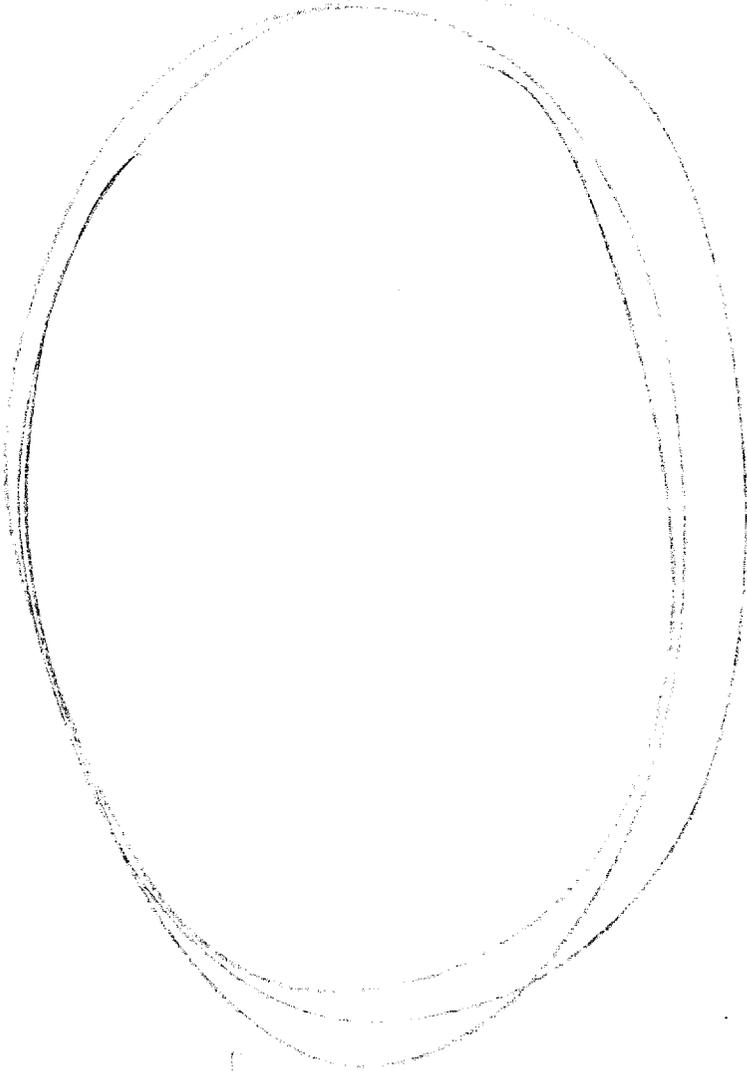

People were pointing up with both hands and it looked as though people were moving up. At the end of the session, I felt that I had lost the structure or the object and I did not feel that I was on the ground. I could still see people.

- Fast movement
- A "UP" Feeling

THE LAND THAT HAS remained a wilderness realm seemingly set aside at the creation. But as a national park—the oldest and largest in the Nation—Yellowstone measures its age, and 1972 marks a century.

During these hundred years, more than 48 million persons have visited the vast federal preserve in northwest Wyoming. For millions of others, the name alone has offered a sense of identity with America. No matter that, among all the national parks, attendance is higher at Great Smoky Mountains, and that the scenery, many claim, is more spectacular at Glacier. Yellowstone continues to stand as and, indeed, in the world.

As I drove through the west entrance of the park on a day stifled by August heat, my thoughts were of a time, years ago, when an aunt returned from a vacation and, as aunts are given to do, distributed souvenirs of places she had visited. For me there was a coin bank in the shape of a moose, with the name "Yellowstone" burned into its wooden base. The bank is still among my belongings, having become, like bronzed baby shoes, one of those possessions kept through sentiment.

Such mementos of the park are found in homes across the country: pictures of Old
