A group of people on land are near numerous angular, low, rough, brownish structures with one rounded or domed structure among them. There is a squalid, primitive feel about this site-- as if the streets are unpaved, muddy and dusty, thatch is part of the construction, and there is a dank, humid, often warm aspect to the climate, though the terrain is rather barren and austere. The people wear long, dark clothing, and seem stern and harsh, hardened by their living conditions and environment. The people are congregating in at least two, but maybe more, groups. There is agitation, turmoil, disturbance, zwietracht, division, disagreement among them. It's like one large, ethnically and culturally homogenous group has been confronted with something outside of its normal social experience and must decide to accept or reject it. One portion of the group accepts it, the other portion rejects it. There is big debate about it all amongst the two portions of the group. There is a further impression of one person among the "against" faction who is vociferous, gesticulating, and "formally" or ritually attacking a person from the outside "agency." This attack is non-fatal, but, though ritualized, can be injurious to an extent. These people speak a language that is non-English/German/Arabic, that produces the AOL/S of something African. At the end of the session, there was a brief AOL or AOL/S of a long, black mechanical construct suggestive of an old steam train.
