SUMMARY

Early in 1955 the Georgetown Research Institute received a directive to investigate peculiar flight phenomena that had been observed in the skies of the neighboring United States. Dr. J. H. Smith was assigned to check into these phenomena and their explanation.

The report of the findings is essentially negative. The series of observations across a little over a year were unusual phenomena were observed during that period, most of them can be attributed to man-made objects as airplanes, balloons, rockets, etc. Some can be attributed to natural phenomena such as flying birds, small clouds, and meteors. There is a hint of indication that some of the somewhat strange observations often called "green fireballs" are actually hot natural phenomena.

Our recommendations are in essence that there is no use in looking any more into the tale of the present time and that we will not be in connection with any of our other studies a clear eye on anyone unusual along this line.
