THE MARS MISSIONS

AS the latest NASA mission speeds on its robotic way to the red planet it is perhaps of interest to recall the fate of most of its predecessors. The list of mishaps is long enough to create at least the suspicion that mere bad luck may not be a sufficient explanation to account for them.

The radios on Mars 1 (1962) and Zond 2 (1964) failed as soon as they neared the planet, as did those of the Mars 2 lander (1971). The lander from Mars 6 (1973) sent no signals and that from Mars 7 the same year was diverted into outer space. Orbiters Mars 4 and Mars 5 were both disabled. The Mars 3 lander had its capsule picture inexplicably switched off after only 20 seconds of operation, and in 1969 Mariner 7's battery unaccountably exploded. In January 1976 NASA reported that eight Soviet and USA probes had been severely damaged on approaching Mars, their radio circuitry having been either burnt out or switched off. In July 1988 the Soviet Union launched two probes, Phobos 1 and Phobos 2. The former veered off into space, but Phobos 2 entered Mars orbit in January 1989. In March the space agency Glavkosmos said the probe was "99% lost for good", after TASS had reported loss of communication. Then in August 1993 the Mars Observer similarly fell silent, just three days before its planned entry into orbit.

In the case of Phobos 2, both optical and infra red cameras sent as their last pictures the image of an object, either a craft or a missile, rising up from the planet's surface. The last few frames have not yet been released by the Russians.

We wonder what odds the bookmakers are offering on the success of the current mission?

Mars May Still Rumble

Source: BBC News Online (<http://news.bbc.co.uk>)

By BBC News Online science editor Dr David Whitchouse

Mars may not be volcanically dead. Lava may have flowed over its surface just a few tens of millions of years ago. Geologists say this is so recent that they cannot rule out the possibility that the Red Planet may burst into life again. A team of US scientists has identified young lava flows on the flanks of two of Mars' largest, thought to be extinct, volcanoes. They say that to settle the issue a lander will be required to visit the sites and analyse the surface rocks.

The evidence that Mars could still be active comes from the Mars Global Surveyor (MGS) spacecraft in orbit around the planet. Dr William Hartmann, from the Planetary Science Institute in Tucson, Arizona, US, together with Dr Alfred McEwen, from the University of Arizona, and colleagues, have used images from the MGS camera to estimate the age of lava flows on the slopes of an extinct volcano called Elysium Mons.

These flows are a mere 20 million years old. Elysium Mons is one of three large volcanoes on Elysium Planitia, the second largest volcanic region on Mars. It is 1,700 by 2,400 km (1060 by 1490 miles) in size. Elysium Mons is the largest volcano in this region, measuring 700 km (435 miles) across and rising 13 km (8 miles) above the surrounding plains.

"Some individual flow units could be as young as 10 million years or less," says Dr Hartmann. "In geological terms, that's so recent that volcanic activity might start up again at any time somewhere on the Red Planet."

The suggestion comes just a few months after scientists found convincing evidence that water may have flowed on the surface of Mars in the past few million years.

The scientists say that the clue lies with the numbers of craters. They counted the number of impact craters of various sizes on lava flows on the planet. The reasoning is that the older a surface, the more impact craters it will have because it has been exposed for longer. But the method of estimating the age of a lava flow is uncertain by a factor of up to four and the team's conclusions have yet to be universally accepted.

"If I tell you I have an area with an age of 20 million years and I'm out by a factor of four, then the true age could be as much as 80 million years. But that's still within the last few per cent of Martian history," said Dr Hartmann.

"This means volcanism did not shut off in the first 2.5 billion years, as some early scientific papers proposed. Rather, the planet apparently continues to have at least some localised, sporadic activity."

The researchers have also found evidence for flows less than 100 million years old on the slopes of Olympus Mons, the Solar System's largest volcano, thought to be long extinct. Definitive answers could only come from a robotic mission to sample surface conditions.

UFOs AND HUMANITY

by Gordon Millington

For nearly half a century the human race has been puzzled and bewildered by the activities of the UFO Phenomenon and only comparatively recently has it become possible for researchers to gain a clear and unequivocal intimation of the purposes to which the majority of reported UFO activities have been and continue to be directed. The correlation and comparative study of reports by groups of witnesses who have been abducted and taken up in UFOs show that humanity has been the target of a structured and invincible attack on powerless men and women, for purposes most people find it hard to believe. Those who have studied the evidence of hundreds of mutually supportive reports over many years, however, find that they cannot avoid the conclusion that the UFO occupants are stealing from the people they abduct human genetic material, and using it to produce a hybrid race, a cross between human and alien. Thanks to the painstaking efforts of researchers such as Budd Hopkins, David Jacobs and John Mack, we now know beyond reasonable doubt that the immediate purpose of the UFO Phenomenon here on Earth is the creation of this bastard race by altering the genetic makeup of human embryos, possibly by the insertion of alien DNA, and bringing them to term in a UFO environment.

Where the hybrids thus created are sent to await their eventual fate, or what indeed the final nature of that destiny may be, are at present matters upon which we can only speculate in the light of suggestions at present lacking adequate confirmation. The subtle approach by whatever intelligence directs the programmed operations of the android UFO crews, and its frighteningly comprehensive grasp of human psychology and physiology, are both at a level which permits it to manipulate the people and governments of our planet, and so pursue its breeding programme unhindered.

Let us therefore now examine the methods by which, over the years, the Phenomenon has been able to achieve such total success. It is important to recognise that the directing intelligence knew it could never hope to operate unobserved, but was able skilfully to provoke and direct observation so as to turn it eventually into a form of psychological concealment. It deliberately sought to make itself incredible by alternately awakening and then discrediting interest and belief in the existence and activities of UFOs by the general public. In this they were greatly helped by the moral cowardice and blind arrogance of the scientific establishment, who were dissuaded by fears of loss of tenure from even examining the evidence they dismissed out of hand. The Phenomenon now needed people to take its existence seriously, so that the required ridicule could be evoked from the cravenly unscientific scientists who would have the confidence of government and public.

The first public appearance of Unidentified Flying Objects (UFOs) is generally thought of as occurring in June 1947, when businessman Kenneth Arnold saw a formation of them over the Cascade Mountains in Washington State, USA. Certainly this was the point in time at which the UFO Phenomenon, as we have since come to call it, made its initial impact on the collective consciousness of the peoples of our world, and it has been persistently challenging us with its varying manifestations ever since.

For a while we were all intrigued by the incredible aerobatics carried out by the "lights in the sky" or LITS, as we soon learned to call them, from the initial letters of the phrase. Buzzing the White House and disrupting the electricity supplies to the American capital kept them for a time on the front pages of newspapers worldwide, but before long even the most intricate supersonic aerial manoeuvres ceased to amaze. The activities of the UFO Phenomenon slipped from the focus to the periphery of human attention, from which even the 1948 death of Captain Mantell in a dramatic attempt to chase a UFO could not retrieve it.

The intelligence directing the phenomena must soon have realised that mere Lights in the Sky were no longer of much interest, as they made no personal impact on anyone. Its purpose seemed to be to regain the fickle attention of humanity, and for this something different was clearly needed. In 1953 the new policy made its first impact with the inspired publication of a book by Desmond Leslie and George Adamski with the arresting and unequivocal title "Flying Saucers Have Landed."

Adamski's story introduced the second phase of the UFO Phenomenon's operational plan, generally known as the Contactee Era. The first phase - the era of the LITS - had established in the corporate human mind the existence of UFOs, without establishing that this existence had any real implications for mankind. The function of the Contactees was to demonstrate that UFOs had a relevance to humanity by showing that they were controlled by entities with a direct, personal connection with people and a message for humanity as a whole. The message was important - not in itself, for it was banal in the extreme - but for credibility: if you are supposed to have come from outer space, you will be expected to have something to say on arrival.

So it naturally came about that the first contacts were the products of a skilful presentation featuring tall, blond and noble ufonauts, delivering trite messages about peace, war and nuclear arms, who offered apparent joyrides in flying saucers to Utopian lands on nearby planets. People like Adamski were probably for the most part quite sincere, but they were deceived and exploited by the Phenomenon for its own purposes. When the necessary idea of a link between the Phenomenon and the peoples of Earth had been successfully promulgated, the trustful expectations proclaimed by the cultist contactees were cruelly disappointed and the believers left exposed to ridicule and contempt. The lesson that you can't necessarily trust an alien, however, still hasn't been learned by everyone, but at that time most people felt that the great flying saucer hoax had been exposed and everyone could relax and carry on with their material concerns as though nothing had happened. But something had indeed happened, though most chose to ignore it.

The alternation of hope and fear is a psychological process well understood by the practitioners of brainwashing everywhere, and the Phenomenon seems to have been well acquainted with the technique, an understanding possibly gleaned from its studies of the mental processes of the Contactees. Having now exhausted what dividends were to be had from hope and benevolence, it was now time to try what fear, threats and abuse could accomplish in an exhaustive study of the physical and psychic structure of the human being of each sex. The third phase - that of the enforced and exploitative abduction - could then be launched, and it is with this aspect of the Phenomenon's activities that we are still currently concerned.

At this point, ufologists became aware of a strange duality, a novel divergence in the apparent policies of the Phenomenon. Having established both its existence and its relevance, its next activities seemed to manifest a bifurcation of intent. Some of its actions suggested an ideological drive, featuring amongst others a promotion of what we have generally come to call "green issues" - a concern with the wellbeing of the planet and its ecology. A parallel thrust, however, seemed to concern itself entirely with the practical promotion of a genetic programme, ruthlessly pursued on a large scale by android clones, which appeared to have as its ultimate outcome the creation of a race of alien/human hybrids. This latter project is the one which has received the most publicity and created the most controversy, largely through the researches of ufologists in the USA, where it seems to be mainly, though by no means exclusively, concentrated.

It might thus seem that there are at least two types of alien, one engaged in the ideological and another in the genetic project, but since there is strong suspicion that the agents of the Phenomenon are capable of presenting themselves to human eyes in any form they wish, descriptions by abductees of the physical appearance of their captors cannot be accepted as objectively valid. The appearance is not necessarily the reality, and though it would be a very convenient paradigm to see the ideologues as responsible also for the apocalypse of the cornfields, while the geneticists ruthlessly ravish human gonads for their breeding schemes, we cannot with any certainty make this distinction. Indeed, if John Mack's more extreme revelations have any validity, the geneticists too may finally be promulgating doctrines similar to those of the ideologues as regards planetary ecology: they seem to want to preserve the planet they perhaps intend to take over for the hybrid race once humanity, repeatedly decimated by disease and catastrophe, is unable to oppose them.

Since we now stand at a particularly challenging point in our attempts to evolve an effective theoretical understanding of the significance for humanity of the activities of the UFO Phenomenon, it is perhaps advisable to consider now how it is that we have arrived at our present situation.

The first adequately investigated abduction took place on October 15th 1957, just ten years after Kenneth Arnold's launch of the term "flying saucer" upon an unsuspecting world. It was not until the following February that Antonio Villas Boas told his incredible story to Dr. Olavo Fontes, doyen of UFO research in South America and Professor of Medicine at Brazil's National Medical School. The case is well known, and I have already examined it in detail elsewhere (1), so that I wish here only to point out that the whole account was recorded without any recourse to hypnosis and that at no time did the witness enter any alternative dimension of spacetime. In fact the landed UFO materialised wholly into our terrestrial dimension and carried out its genetic intervention in ways we would consider entirely earth-normal, both in the physical struggle of witness and abductors and in the subsequent sexual coupling. We may suppose that the intention of the Phenomenon at this point was to produce as credible an intervention as possible if, as must surely have been expected, it was to be reported. Most significant in this respect was surely the female alien's parting gesture, pointing first to her presumably impregnated womb, and then up to the sky, especially as she also had collected a further sperm sample in a container. The message was unmistakably one of inter-species breeding - the new concept to be introduced, and ultimately accepted by humanity. Its dissemination was, however, unexpectedly delayed by the very proper caution of the investigator. At a time when ufology was still suffering the ridicule the Contactees had finally evoked, Dr. Fontes was well aware of the probable response by the media to an account so highly strange as that of the Brazilian farmer. He therefore delayed publication of his report and advised the witness accordingly. It is especially worthy of note that in this case there was no verbal or mental communication between abductors and abductee, so that it stands as a pure example of the ideal (2) genetic type, uniquely free of any ideological element.

A further ten years had to elapse before, in December 1967, we find an equally pure example of the ideological or apocalyptic type of encounter, also with a landed UFO but without any sexual overtones, in the case of police sergeant Herbert Schirmer of Ashland, Nebraska (1), which also features one of the earliest examples of the now common "missing time" syndrome. The clumsy treatment and discourteous interviewing Schirmer received at the hands of the Condon Committee robbed us of a full account of his experience from which, however, we learn that there was telepathic contact to enforce the idea of an extra-terrestrial origin for the aliens, revealed in the subsequent hypnosis, for at this time the ETH was being actively promoted, perhaps just because it seemed so incredible to academic scientists who could therefore be relied upon to pour scorn upon it. In addition to the breeding and indoctrination schemes, the ufonauts sometimes indulged in a little deception I call prospecting, apparently showing great interest in collecting the flora and fauna of Earth. This so precisely reflects the kind of behaviour in which humans might indulge were they to find themselves on a new and unknown world that one begins to think this is the impression the ufonauts were seeking to give of themselves, so that even human abductions and cattle stealing were seen as part of some alien scientific survey, having no object other than the pure pursuit of knowledge for its own sake, and further promoting the idea that the Ufonauts are unfamiliar with planet Earth and its inhabitants.

When Maurice Masse was abducted at Valensole, France, in 1965 the Ufonauts were discovered examining his lavender plants, and the Lorenzens in their 1967 publication "Flying Saucer Occupants" described a number of instances in which samples of water, grass, tomato plants and even soil were collected. In 1957 a small being had even attempted to kidnap a dog in New Jersey. This prospecting behaviour seems to have died out during the sixties and had perhaps been another attempt to support the ETH at a time when some believed the aliens had successfully established themselves in secret bases on Earth itself. The thefts of animal tissue, which still continue, are almost certainly associated, not with prospecting, but with the breeding programme.

Just as the prospecting behaviour disappeared when ETH reinforcement ceased to matter, so the direct ideological approach seems to have been abandoned soon afterwards. We have to go back to 1974 to find the last pure case of ideological conditioning, when John and Sue Day, their children and even their car were all hauled aboard an enormous UFO and apparently underwent an out-of-the-body (OBE) experience in which enormous amounts of information were pumped into their brains by a special machine to produce a complete attitude change in favour of green issues. Sue was unable to absorb most of this, but John suffered a nervous breakdown which made him unfit for work for a whole year. The aliens seem to have drawn the obvious conclusion that this was an inefficient method of indoctrination and seem now to be combining the genetic and ideological programmes into a carefully structured assault on the persons and personalities of their abductees. This often involves dire warnings to save the planet by changing the lifestyles and ecological attitudes of humanity. For the clearest and most concise account of the current abduction activities of the Phenomenon we are indebted to Dr. David Jacobs, Associate Professor of History at Temple University, Philadelphia, whose taxonomic investigation of some 300 accounts provided by 60 witnesses has produced a coherent statement of the meaning for humanity of this calculated assault on its future identity. The following account owes much to his work, which shows that the UFO occupants are pursuing a basically sequential set of operations on the unfortunate abductees, entirely of course without their consent. When challenged on this point, they make the extraordinary assertion that they have a right to do what they have to do. In their telepathic communications with abductees they evince absolutely no interest in anything human other than the physiology and psychology of the individual. For them Art, Literature, Music, social institutions and corporate activities seem not to exist, and they show a total inability to in anyway empathise with human attitudes and emotions, or to show any compassion for the suffering they often inflict. They thus reveal themselves as sub-human organic androids, most probably clones, acting only in accordance with the pre-programmed promptings of an internal logic file. Among them there are found slightly taller individuals with more sophisticated programming, who act as supervisors and overseers of operations.

Their absolute power over abductees arises solely from the superior technology available to them, some of which extends to a temporary control of their victims' mental processes, which they are constantly seeking to understand more fully. Though endowed by their unknown creators with this technology enabling a total control and exploitation of individual humans, they seem in all other respects soulless and inferior to the species whose attributes they are apparently seeking to appropriate.

Abductees are selected quite at random from all walks of life, with the proviso that they must either be sexually functional or pre-pubertal. There have been instances of older people, such as Elsie Oakensen and Alfred Burtoo, being rejected on these criteria. Victims are preferably taken at night and when alone, so that they are less likely to be missed, though any companions can if necessary be "switched off" until the abductee returns, unaware also of the time that has passed. On reaching the UFO, the victim is stripped naked, secured to a table and subjected to an exhaustive and often painful physical examination. If this is a second or subsequent occasion, any changes are at once noted and enquired into. Sperm is taken from men and eggs from women, who are liable also to be implanted with a fertilised and manipulated egg which will be removed at some subsequent stage of foetal development.

The ideological aspect of the abduction is now carried out by a process Jacobs calls "mindscan", in which a taller being looks deeply into the eyes of the subject, simultaneously both reading and controlling his or her thoughts. Physical control of the victim is maintained at all times by what appears to be a manipulation of muscle tone, often induced by a mere touch from the alien.

At some point in the series of abductions all victims undergo, they are shown the mechanisms of the hybrid breeding programme - tubes leading to transparent fluid containers holding fetuses in various stages of development, surrounded by machines controlling the supply of nutrients. At a later stage they are shown the babies thus produced, which appear sickly and languid by human standards, and every effort is made to provoke feelings of bonding in the women, who are always asked (and if necessary made) to hold babies said to be their own. It appears that human contact of this kind is essential for the proper development of the hybrid children, whose conception, "birth" and rearing is the sole apparent purpose of the whole amoral project.

Although witness reports are generally recovered by investigators using hypnosis, there is usually no difference between memories spontaneously recovered and those re-experienced under the guidance of a skilled and impartial hypnotic investigator. There is, undeniably, a danger of confabulation and False Memory Syndrome, where the investigator is consciously or unconsciously influencing the subject's recall, and this must always be discounted if there is reason to suspect it has occurred. The findings of Professor John Mack of Harvard have been challenged in this respect, for although many of the details he reports from hypnotic sessions are entirely congruent with those of other investigators, some of his suggestions concerning developing relationships between humans, alien androids and bastard hybrids have received no support as yet from other investigators, and must consequently be considered suspect.

Nevertheless, some thought that the achievement of the alien purposes will be for the benefit of both races. The only support forthcoming for this startling assertion comes from a single-witness case of 1973, that 51 year old "Elizabeth Richmond" (3) recalled some 18 years after the event. It suggested that it would be for aliens a logical step to find some way of becoming acceptable to at least some humans, who might be needed as allies in a final conquest of humanity. They cannot have failed to note that rejection by female abductees of the hybrid babies the aliens describe as "beautiful" was the normal reaction, despite repeated attempts to make these women believe themselves mothers of these listless children. If abductees can be persuaded that they are in fact alien souls in human bodies, then the recruitment of a subversive army devoted to the alien cause becomes a possibility. This is precisely what Mack, from his hypnosis of several abductees, claims to be the case. "Elizabeth Richmond", using a self-hypnosis technique, claimed to recall that, after the usual medical examination, a taller being giving his name as Maag took her aside into a separate room and, grasping her hands and looking deeply into her eyes, told her that she was an alien who had been his partner and the mother of his two beautiful daughters. When he then presented them to her she was overcome by emotion, 'recognising' them and 'remembering' their names. Maag was pleased about this and told her that it was only because of the nasal implant they had just given her that this recall had been possible. He also told her that her alien soul had been inserted into her present body at the birth of her son when she was 22 years old. She embraced her 'daughters' warmly, and found them 'beautiful' without any urging. Mack might well consider this case to be an early forerunner of a process he now believes to have been perfected. If it is true, as he suggests, that the ultimate purpose of the Phenomenon's breeding programme is the replacement of humanity on Earth by the hybrid race bred in the UFOs, then this is an outcome to which the human species can scarcely remain indifferent. Though Mack seems to think the bastard breed will contain the best elements of both its begetters, it could just as easily embody their worst, so why should mankind voluntarily abdicate in its favour? If the android ufonauts who were the instruments of its creation were programmed to bring this about, then who could have written their program and loaded their operating system? Are they perhaps mere precursors, a fifth column infiltrating and preparing a takeover of Earth for the ultimate benefit of their begetters? And who might those begetters be? When Presidents Reagan and Gorbachev spoke to each other of uniting in the face of alien invasion, could they perhaps have been given an inkling of such possibilities as the current activities of the UFO Phenomenon imply? Has anyone told George W. Bush? Time could be running out! -----

OPENING A MARTIAN "CAN OF WORMS...?"

By Ron Nicks, Geologist, Terracon, A GeoTechnical Engineering Company Enterprise Mission Consulting Geologist.

A most interesting feature came to light on Mars recently. Amid the over 60,000 newly-released images from the current unmanned NASA probe (MGS), non-NASA "Enterprise Mission" researchers discovered a strange "tubular structure" in the Martian deserts (MOC frame M04-00291), located at about 40 degrees north latitude. This remarkable "tube," roughly a mile in length and hundreds of feet wide, appears to cling to a desert canyon wall near the canyon's bottom, and extend along its entire length. The feature has the appearance of being "translucent," of being supported at somewhat regular intervals by "ribs," and of being quite cylindrical -- with a localised, internal structure at one point of considerably higher albedo (brightness). To define this feature in purely geological terms has been a considerable challenge. The reasons for this are discussed below.

For starters, the "tube" appears to be very resistant to erosion, as it lies directly along the flow line of what could be considered a fairly major tributary drainage from the surrounding level plain. But, what if it's not "drainage" at all? If not that (which would eliminate one erosion problem for the "tube" - i.e. flowing water), what could be an alternative explanation for this incised feature (the canyon) in this currently totally desiccated desert landscape? A few other geologic mechanisms come to mind:

- 1) The canyon could be a structural feature, related to faulting and consequent weakening of materials along the trend of the fault;
- 2) It could be the coming together of two different material types - what geologists routinely term a "nonconformity";
- 3) Or, it could be the juxtaposition of similar material types, with differing structural orientations on opposite sides of their contact.

None of these potential explanations to explain the "canyon," or the "tube" within it, is totally satisfactory. If faulting were the mechanism, then (with one exception) it could be expected that the feature would be somewhat more linear. (The exception is the trace of a low-angle thrust fault, which can produce a very sinuous path across the landscape.) There doesn't appear to be any major, discernible difference in material types on either side of the "canyon," which would be evidence for a nonconformity. Similarly, there is no clear indication that materials on either side of the "canyon" have different structural characteristics - such as "horizontal deposits being deposited on and along deposits that have been previously folded or tipped."

What about the possibility of "lava tubes?"

Initially, that seems to be a perfectly reasonable means for creating a "tubular feature" of the size being seen in these images from Mars, and we know (from this and previous unmanned missions) that there has been extensive ancient volcanic activity on the planet, particularly in these Northern level plains. As I see it, however, the "lava tube possibility" becomes much less convincing when one considers two very clear pieces of evidence in the image containing the "tube" itself ... and for which there is no reasonable geological explanation as yet. First: why is it that the tube has "ribs" at nearly consistent intervals, ninety degrees to the axis of the approx. 600-foot-wide "cylinder," and stretching throughout its entire sinuous path; and, why do the ribs appear to be composed of different materials than the tube itself? Second, if the canyon were there first, the lava would logically flow down its length -- filling it from wall to wall. So, the tube (as a separate cylindrical volume) had to predate the formation of the canyon proper - and had to have formed (or be placed there - see below) under pre-existing, overlying materials. If those overlying deposits were volcanic or of relatively homogeneous composition, then what accounts for the (later, eroded) canyon "just happening" to follow the path of the tube proper? From a geologic perspective, understanding the relationship of "the canyon to the tube" is perhaps even more important to solving this mystery than understanding the genesis of the tube itself.

So, what is the genesis of that "convenient" canyon?

Having briefly pointed out - and reluctantly discarded - what might be considered the most readily recognisable and reasonable geologic mechanisms for these two associated structures, where might a geologist turn next? For, I am a geologist, not a biologist -- but since geology, as yet, gives us no clear-cut answer to this problem, let's at least consider the possibility of an ancient, biologic mechanism to account for this remarkable Martian feature...

Although the following postulation is at first glance preposterous, let's see if there may be some merit in at least its tentative consideration...

If there were a large biological entity on Mars - such as an annelid-type worm, known for its burrowing and tilling of soils - such a creature might account for the combination of geologic anomalies, and their association with what appears to be the remains of a large "glass-like worm!" It is a fact that in the image the feature looks like a "glass worm" - especially if one does not take the prodigious scale into account.

Consider this: our hypothetical alien "creature" is busily burrowing along under the ancient Martian surface, and suddenly there is some sort of "catastrophe" that stops him in his tracks. A considerable amount of time goes by ... and the unconsolidated material loosened by his burrowing is simply more susceptible to mass wasting, weathering and wind erosion than the undisturbed materials farther from his path. So, an eroded "canyon" eventually develops in his immediate vicinity, revealing his former presence through removal of the overlying and surrounding sediments...

There is precedent for such "silica producing organisms" here on Earth - for example, radiolaria - which produce siliceous "tests." Then, there are other silica-producing organisms that create literal tubular "glass straws" as by-products of their eating habits. (It's the "glass straw" left under the skin of a host by a "chigger" that creates the maddening itch - long after the chigger has departed).

The unfortunate reality of this "chigger analogy" is also a fairly convincing argument against the reality of our hypothetical Martian "glass worm"; chiggers live off of blood, sucked from an unwitting host. In other words, you have one biologic entity living off another biologic entity. (That's exactly what the rest of us do on Earth to this day with every meal.) However, on Mars - where this "creature" is shown to be nearly a mile long and hundreds of feet across, the eminently practical question arises: "What the heck did it eat?!"

Unfortunately, that simple question - along with this feature's tremendous length and width - goes a long way toward discounting such a fascinating biologic speculation. So, what's left?

I may not be a biologist, but I am a registered, certified geologist, and an engineering geologist at that. There is already a groundswell of evidence for engineered structures on the surface of the planet Mars, from past and current NASA missions. The Cydonia region alone has produced some extremely convincing evidence of past construction, not to mention the many other images returned by MGS that now show what would otherwise be inexplicable, "bewildering geology" - if it were not obviously "sound engineering."

In this case - the case of the "mysterious "glass worm" -- that explanation (sound engineering) seems to me, ironically, to be "the simplest, most rational explanation": we may be looking at the exhumed remains of the nothing more "exotic" than the Lincoln Tunnel.

The only thing: it just "happens" to be constructed on another planet.

The Hybrid Puzzle

Written By Colin Mulligan

According to some ufologists there is startling evidence to suggest that extra-terrestrials are conducting an alien/human hybridisation programme. But if this is really the case, what reasons can aliens have to conduct such a programme?

It is often reported in alleged alien abduction cases that sperm or eggs are taken from the abductees. Further to this there are, of course, the many Villa Boas type cases - people claiming to have been abducted and "made" to copulate with extra-terrestrials. In the Villa Boas case the Brazilian even claimed that after "seduction" the female alien patted her stomach and pointed upwards to the stars. This giving rise to the suggestion among many that the female alien was indicating the child resulting from intercourse would be born on another distant planet.

It's reports such as these which have caused many ufologists to reason that the abductors must be intent on some hybrid breeding programme. But if this is so, why would extra-terrestrials want to create hybrids?

Well, let us briefly explore a couple of ideas. Firstly, it's always possible that the breeding programme is being carried out for our benefit, to save us from ourselves, and that the alien/human hybrids are improved versions of us. For example, perhaps they are without the psychopathic and sociopathic tendencies so many humans unfortunately display. Perhaps the hybrids are destined to be "planted" among us and work towards eradicating poverty and war. They could, in essence, be more spiritually advanced, in greater harmony with a cosmic ethical code for peace and understanding. In short, they could be less human and greater part alien.

It's all a matter of personal opinion, of course, but for me this idea is just a little bit too New Age and too romantic. It does, in fact, bring to mind the Aetherius Society and their belief in Great Cosmic Masters like Jesus of Venus watching over us. Indeed, I can't help but feel that this way of thinking is merely quasi-religious in origin. In brief, we undoubtedly occupy a troubled planet and some people feel a whole lot better about this fact if they generate a belief system which entails benevolent "Higher Powers". In the case of the hybrid programme the whole puzzle simply becomes, in the eyes of such people, merely another manifestation of "Guardian Angels" ensuring, although rather bizarrely, our ultimate safety and continuation.

Another idea possibly worth thinking about is that the extra-terrestrials are intent upon producing human/alien hybrids for purely selfish reasons. Perhaps they even intend an invasion of the earth and global colonisation. Some ufologists believe, for instance, that there is evidence to suggest that certain aliens may be unable to live on earth and so are busy creating hybrids that are compatible to life here. Taken further, perhaps these hybrids will be deliberately programmed to be servile and susceptible, thus enabling their creators to wield the real power while they are used as mere puppets.

One point which could be argued here is that purpose built robots would do the job just as well. We suppose, after all, that the aliens are highly advanced in technological terms, would it not be less timely and messy to build legions of mechanised drones to exact requirements and let them invade instead? Something to perhaps think about perhaps.

Finally, here is another idea which, while basically encompassing the previous two, offers another reason for hybridisation. It is the popular theory that aliens have been carrying out a hybridisation programme on earth for millions of years and they have no other motive than they are impelled by some force or other to colonise as many planets as possible. Perhaps hybridisation and colonisation of planets is their mission in life. Or else perhaps our visitors are simply the tools of other more highly advanced aliens with motives of their own.

Many books have been written in general support of this Von Daniken type theory, of course. And the evidence assembled by some of these people, especially when it is of the historical kind, is often very startling and, at the very least, thought provoking. In the book 'Mankind, Child Of The Stars', for instance, the authors, Max H. Flindt & Otto O. Binder, ask us to ponder on whether ancient hybridisation could account for things like mankind's unique sense of destiny, his insatiable curiosity and craving for religion.

Furthermore, they suggest that the giants and monster-men read about in the bible and in myths and legends could actually have been real and, in fact, the first abortive attempts at alien hybridisation. They even suggest that a percentage of the 100,000 plus people who seemingly vanish from the earth each year may be "abducted" by extra-terrestrials in an effort to further the hybrid breeding programme. Perhaps they suggest we are hybrids ourselves and, out there among distant stars, we may have humanoid relatives.

As stated earlier, the data, especially of the historical kind, mounted up in support of this kind of theory is very startling. And to further presume that the reports of biosexual connotations in recent abduction cases could well be just further evidence for an ongoing breeding programme, does not take a lot of doing. However, despite all this evidence nothing has yet been conclusively proved and the theory like the two before is still open to questions and detractors.

In this short time we have only talked about three possible reasons for the reported removal of sperm and eggs, sexual seduction, in alien abduction cases. I am sure there are many other ideas and theories floating around. I hope so because out of the wild wood of speculation the truth may one day emerge. However, perhaps we should also be ready to accept the possibility that we may never comprehend the actual motive behind all this. Perhaps we are not meant to. We use in these circumstances the only tool open to us - human logic. And we must always remember that we are, after all, dealing with extra-terrestrials here of unknown origin and ethics. Perhaps they use such lateral thought processes the real truth will always stay just beyond our reach. Maybe, some might say, this is just as well.

Balanced Critique of Alford Vs Sitchin & Von Daniken

JR = Jeff Rense    RB = Ron Bach

JR: Hi Ron, it has been more than one year since we talked about UFOs and comets/asteroids and the end of the world...

RB: Well, yes Jeff, true. Last we talked was what predicted... hits in November or August? Anyway, a lot has happened since. Firstly, as I noted in my previous articles at your site, neither the asteroids arrived nor was Y2K a serious issue. But I was rather intrigued by Alford's three-part article about ancient mystery schools, religion, God, heaven, and underworld. So I wanted to put things in their right perspective. So, here I am trying to be supportive as well as presenting a balanced critique to your audience.

JR: Do you mean you disagree with Alford's hypothesis?

RB: Well, yes and no. I am in a rather difficult position here as over these years I have become fond of Alan Alford, Erich Von Daniken, and Zecharia Sitchin's writings. In fact, I myself have spent three decades researching ancient Sanskrit texts - what I fondly refer to as AST, and have come to a conclusion that all of us - humanity - have off-planet origins. I would like to add that despite being critical of Richard Hoagland in my first article, I support Hoagland's premise, amongst several other researchers, that we might have arrived here from Mars.

JR: Interesting. Please elaborate.

RB: Sure. If you remember, Alford's first book "The Gods of the New Millennium" was very supportive of both Von Daniken and Sitchin's hypothesis. I might add that Sitchin only claims to be a reporter so I might be misusing the word hypothesis with his works, namely, "The Earth Chronicles" amongst others. However, in "The Phoenix Solution" and thereafter, Alford seems to have turned 180 degrees - by his own admission - of whatever he wrote or believed while compiling "The Gods of the New Millennium". I personally believe that Alford was right on track with "The Gods of the New Millennium" but rather veered off course with his later works. However, I reiterate that this is my personal belief and I might be wrong, so please make your own decisions and judgements. Now onto the Mars issue amongst other things, I am sure that your audience hears a lot about Mars and evidently after the "Face on Mars" issue, Mars is really getting hot. Ironically, ancient Sanskrit texts also refer to Mars as a hot planet and even the Chinese (Cantonese) call Mars "Fo Sing". Where "Fo" means fire and "Sing" means star. As you know Jeff, I have lived in India, Nepal, China, and Hong Kong amongst several countries on all continents of our planet and I am very fluent with all these languages as well as their ancient literature. And my hobby or rather goal is similar to all researchers currently engaged in exploring mythology - meaning to explore our true origins. Almost all cultures - especially Far East, Central Asia, as well as Middle East - that I have come across, strikingly bear the same parallels and same mythology, to the extent that even their creation stories as well as Gods are similar. So when Alford says that the Gods were comets or what have you, I would have to totally disagree. For example, in his three-part article at your site, Alford allegorises that: "ONCE UPON A TIME, according to Sumerian lore, in the days before mankind had been created, a rogue demon known as Zu had stolen the so-called 'tablets of destiny' from the Earth, causing the crucial 'bond' between Heaven and Earth to be broken. As Zu flew off to his heavenly 'mountain', the gods on the Earth were plunged into darkness. Who would stand up to Zu and recover the magical tablets? The challenge was accepted by a god named Ningirsu, who soared up into the Sky and launched a fierce attack upon Zu, using seven mighty whirlwinds and fourteen storm-floods. Zu was defeated. He was cast down to the Earth in the form of a 'Sling-Stone', and his heavenly 'mountain' was smashed into pieces, causing a huge flood of ice and rock to fall upon the Earth below. In triumph, Ningirsu returned to the Earth flying the 'Imdugud-bird' - the celestial vehicle of his defeated enemy Zu. Thus it was that the Sumerian king Gudea came to build the Eninnu temple - commemorating not only the capture of the Imdugud-bird, but also the act of creation by Ningirsu, which fecundated the Earth and turned it into a lush garden of paradise." I could cite you the Vedic references and specifically Markandya Purana - where Purana means genealogy and Markandya was a sage, which describes the exact same story. Only the name Zu is changed to Shumbh and Nishumbh in Sanskrit - notice the similarity to the pronunciation Zu in Sanskrit? And instead of Ningirsu it was Navdurga - where in Sanskrit Nav means nine and Durga means the Goddess mother. In fact if instead of reading the entire Markandya Purana in Sanskrit, if you only read the Chandi Paath - a religious text even read today in sub-continent India, you could basically get the same story in details that Alford is talking about. Although I doubt there is any English translation of that story and I will be happy to translate that mythological story in English on my upcoming web site if your audience so desires.

JR: You bring up the term God and these so-called beings, namely Zu and Ningirsu. Alford seems to suggest that God is a celestial or heavenly body that descended upon Earth. How do you see God and are you religious, if I may ask?

RB: Good question Jeff. First let me tell you that I am not religious in a conventional way. However, I am adamant that Von Daniken and Sitchin are much closer to the truth about "Gods" being flesh and blood beings. However, I am puzzled that all of them, Alford, Von Daniken, and Sitchin, ignore the Vedic literature and mythology. Sitchin has given some insights on Vedic cultures but in my opinion that is barely a preview. Vedic literature refers to what some believe are the oldest texts - for example Rig Veda - that we as humans possess. Vedic literature is written in Sanskrit and currently Sanskrit is written in Devanagiri script whereas in the past Sanskrit was written in several rather outdated scripts one of which being the Brahmi script. I must add that Sanskrit is thought of predating the Sumerian clay tablets. If you were to explore and exploit - and I consciously use the term exploit - Vedic literature scientifically, then you will realise that we humans were not as primitive as portrayed and Sumeria or Sumer certainly was not the first civilisation as accredited by major universities around the world. In fact, "Sumeru Parvat" or rather Mount Sumeru in English is constantly mentioned in Vedas alongside the Saraswati River. And it is this mountain - as in mountains mentioned in ancient religious texts - that was part of the "Gods" abode, another mountain being "Kailas Parvat" or Mount Kailas in English. The very fact that both Sumeru and Kailas mountains are extensively mentioned in Vedic texts indicate that the Vedic cultures were not descendants of Sumerian cultures but rather coexisted simultaneously. This, due to the proven fact that Saraswati River dried up around 2000 BC. For example, let me highlight a place called Lothal that existed in what now is Gujarat State of India. All the Gujaratis are believed to be descendants of Lothal. However, Lothal was a port that traded in those days with what we refer to as Sumer or Mesopotamia and people from Lothal migrated to all places including Middle East and what is now known as Sri Lanka. Even the pottery, the inscriptions, the insignia, etc. found in Sumer bear a striking resemblance to what was discovered in the Harappa and Mohenjodaro civilisations. Apart from Lothal, another place of significance not faraway is Dwarka or rather Bet Dwarka which is now under sea and Dwarka the new Dwarka city is an exact replica of Bet Dwarka. And I must add that the now dried up Saraswati river used to flow in branches through all the above places and reached as far as Middle East via Rajasthan and Gulf of Cambay - both in Gujarat State of India. These places bear great significance in our origins including that of Caucasians as you will see later in my book - The Star Federations - which will not be published anytime soon. I am rather disappointed by the fact that Sitchin gives so little consideration to Vedic India or Indian sub-continent of that time and in doing so has accidentally ignored the most important clue to our origins. While Sitchin talks about Sumerians, Akkadians, etc., he is either unaware or forgot to mention that Akkadians were a wandering tribe that travelled between Vedic India and Sumer of those days. Perhaps Dr. David Frawley can throw more light on this subject, as he is one man who has certainly done his Vedic homework. But to summarise this question, I will say that we all humanity are descendants or rather refugees from planet Mars and Alford has inadvertently supported my hypothesis in his three part article at your site as well as his book "When The Gods Came Down".

JR: You are opening Pandora's box here.

RB: Yes Jeff, I know what you mean. But let me start by saying that the search for Atlantis will be fruitless. That Mars is Atlantis. That the deluge story that Sitchin has detailed and so have other religious texts like Sumerians, Bible, Vedas, etc., are actually speaking about the exodus from Mars to Earth and not on Earth itself. That what Sitchin refers to as "splashed down on earth" and what Alford refers to as "the Gods who came down to Earth did so amidst fiery rocks and floodwaters" is nothing else but an emergency evacuation from Mars to Earth. So now going back to whether I am criticising Alford or supporting Von Daniken and Sitchin, it is clearly evident that all of them are just looking at parts of what the real truth might be. I must admit that I too am a part of this and I am just the glue sticking these people together.

JR: Ron, in this field we want proof and evidence. Most readers will want hard evidence and might treat your hypothesis or story as hearsay. What proof or evidence do you offer and how or why should we believe what you say?

RB: Yes Jeff, your concern is very valid and I too am skeptical, as many of my readers already know. But let me ask you a counter question and then explain my premise. The question being, I have just lived on this planet for approximately 4 decades something and so has everyone else - at the most 8 or 9 decades - and these are events that occurred thousands if not millions of years ago. How can anyone have any factual evidence or proof? It isn't like going to a bank vault - even in Switzerland - and getting out tablets, although that is exactly what Sitchin has done by accessing materials from Museums and what have you. On the same count, everything I have mentioned above is openly available in public domain and if I might add in religious texts of several civilisations. Whether one takes it as mythology or as the basis of my premise is ones own choice. Therefore, I will have to say that once again, Alford has half-truth and even that is worth reading and researching, as I have known Alford to be one thorough personality. Perhaps being a chartered accountant is what brings in the thoroughness and rigidity alongside discipline. But then even Von Daniken and Sitchin are equally sincere and zealous in their goal or mission. I believe that such people are naturally born and no amount of training can ever gear anyone in these fields. Further to the other part of your question about why people should believe in what I say, just think about this - How come we have so many varieties of life forms and species on this planet and are we to believe that apart from what we find on planet Earth, the rest of the Universe is barren? Moreover, as I have mentioned earlier, I have indisputable proof that we are from Mars, but I hope that you will accept that I am entitled to preserve those evidences and facts until the publication of my upcoming book – "The Star Federations".

JR: Fair enough and finally do you think NASA or others - let us say certain groups or individuals - are privy to what you say?

RB: Jeff, I do not subscribe to conspiracies and immaterial of all the hoopla about secret groups or agencies or what have you on the Internet, all I have to say is that those in command and power are probably doing the best for our interests - humanity's interests - and further to that I have no comments. Even I myself was born on 19.5 Northern Hemisphere, and I am not associated with any secret societies so, go figure. In other words, we can get to be as paranoid as we want to be.

JR: Thanks Ron, it was nice talking to you. How can our audience get back to you if they have questions?

RB: You are most welcome Jeff. Yours is truly an inestimable show and site. From my past experiences, I'd rather not give out my new email address, as I am afraid I will be overwhelmed. But you do have my private email and if Alford, Von Daniken, or Sitchin have any questions or comments you can forward them my address. And I do promise to come up with either an article or yet another interview where I will give out my new web site and email address as and when appropriate. I would further say Jeff, that you are the lead personality in this field. Keep up that show as it is and we are all looking forward to it. Keep up the great work and I always listen to your show on the Internet and so does a great part of Asia Pacific from what I know. May the force be with you and give my best to all your loved ones ever. Bye now.

LEGENDARY 'GOATSUCKER' RE-APPEARS IN CHILE

Source: Fox News (<http://www.foxnews.com>) By Jimmy Langman

SANTIAGO, Chile. Last April, dozens of farm animals sheep, pigs, chickens began turning up dead in northern Chile, their bodies completely drained of blood and bearing odd vampire-like bite marks.

For many Chileans, this could mean only one thing: The mythical "Chupacabras," or "goat-sucker," Latin America's version of Count Dracula, was back in the news.

In the northern desert town of Calama, where the "attacks" first began, locals immediately began to hang crosses in front of their homes. Jose Ismael Pino, a farm worker near the central city of Concepcion, is among the many Chileans who claim to have had an up-close experience with the Chupacabras. "It just stood there looking at me," Pino told local newspaper Cronica. "It stood about four feet tall, like a big monkey, with long clawed arms, enormous fangs protruding from its mouth, as well as a pair of wings."

The Chupacabras legend began in Puerto Rico in 1995, when eight sheep were found dead with the same telltale signs: bloodless corpses with bite marks.

Over the next year, reports of attacks multiplied, with the Chupacabras popping up in Texas, Costa Rica, Mexico, Guatemala and Brazil. A cult-like and no doubt profitable industry has formed around the Chupacabras in Latin America, spawning T-shirts, bumper stickers, squeaky toys, candies, sandwiches and songs.

The myth lost steam after 1996, only to resurface a few months ago in western Nicaragua, northern Mexico and northern Chile.

Since the first attacks in Calama last spring, well over 800 animals of all kinds have been killed in similar incidents in just about every region of Chile. The monster has been variously described as a large rodent or a mutant kangaroo, while others claim it is a winged, ape-like being that walks in a zig-zag pattern.

Lilliana Romero, a schoolteacher in Concepcion, Chile, told the local newspaper that she woke up in the middle of the night and saw a Chupacabras.

"I crouched and looked through the window," she told El Sur. "I could see the back of what appeared to be an immense man, standing more than two metres [6 feet, 8 inches] tall. The shoulder blades were split, as if he had wings." The next day, Romero said, she found a completely bloodless dog dead in the alleyway behind her house.

Another wave of hysteria swept Chile in May when rumours spread that three Chupacabras a male, a female, and a cub were captured by Chilean soldiers near a mine north of Calama. Some locals even claimed that a team of NASA scientists arrived in a black helicopter and took them away.

The popular rumour in Calama these days is that the Chupacabras escaped from a secret NASA experiment in the Atacama Desert of northern Chile, where they say the space agency is trying to replicate the conditions of a voyage to the planet Mars.

As for Chilean authorities, they have steadfastly maintained that most of the attacks were caused by packs of feral dogs.

The Chupacabras legend is beginning to take root in Chile for good, said Bernardo Valenzuela, an anthropology professor at the University of Chile.

"These animals, whatever they are, just suck the blood of their victims, without eating their meat no wonder the popular imagination has generated this legend," Valenzuela told FOXNews.com.

Fear of the night and fascination with werewolves may have also played a key role in the popularity of the Chupacabras myth, anthropologists say.

The Chupacabras' existence has never been scientifically proven; skeletal cadavers and decomposing remains have been proudly produced by farmers from time to time but have ended up identified as dead dogs or bats.

But in the meantime, the Latin GoatSucker continues to inspire the public's imagination, and its legend grows in the Chilean countryside as well as in thousands of Web pages.

THE OMEGA AGENCY

They are who people are talking about when one says orders come from "above the President".

(N.B. This article was written when George Bush Senior was the U.S. President. )

The Omega Agency consists of a network set up much like the CIA. There are thousands world-wide who take their orders directly from the ruling council of the Omega Agency. This council consists of 10 to 12 people. George Bush and Alexander C. Haig are two names known to sit on the council of the Omega Agency. The OA is the driving force behind what is commonly called the "New World Order." The OA's office is located at Langley AFB.

They plan to establish their NWO, for lack of a better term, in a time span of no less than 5 days. And they intend to do it without open war.

Recall when President Reagan was shot. Haig made the statements to the press that "I'm in charge now." If you'll remember, he caught a lot of flack for that, and shortly thereafter, he was accused of various things that ruined his name politically. This was done by members of Congress who were aware of his seat on the Omega Agency council, and they feared losing their claim to power. Haig jumped the gun in his statements, and ended up giving up his political position because of it. Had Reagan died, we would have had Bush as President, and Haig as Secretary of State. Two men in power who sit on the OA council. But because of the commotion raised by a few members of Congress, Haig faded into the background rather than risk exposure of his connection to the OA, or of the OA itself.

Recall when the Gulf War started. Bush used the exact words "New World Order" in his speech to the country. He said it several times, that the Gulf War marked the beginning of a NWO. The Gulf War was not a war about oil or the freedom of the people of Kuwait. It was a test of how well multi-national troops under the guidance of the UN would react in a war situation. The same holds true for Somalia and Bosnia. Multi-national troops under the direction of the UN. The Omega Agency controls the UN.

Bush didn't lose the election to Clinton. Bush needed to be out of the limelight of the presidency in order to concentrate on and escalate the plans of the Omega Agency. And in Clinton, they had a stooge who would not rock the boat and who would do what he was told. Notice how quick Clinton has been to commit US troops to UN peace-keeping forces here and there. Notice who Clinton appointed as Secretary of State - Madeline Albright, the UN lady. Notice who Clinton gave federal land to - the UN.

Why the need for a one-world government? The reasoning of the Omega Agency is this: Crime is out of control on a world-wide basis, especially in the US. People are out of control, not taking responsibility for themselves or their actions. Population growth is out of control on a world-wide level. The judicial system of the US is a joke. The political system of the US and most countries world-wide is a joke, corrupted and polluted by greed and power-hungry people who don't care about the population they were elected or appointed to serve. Under the governing body the Omega Agency plans to put in power, this would end. End of trial by jury. End of living off of society and not contributing your fair share. End of taking advantage of others for one's own personal gain. All who are able would contribute to the growth and well-being of the world's society, or they would pay the price for not pulling their fair share.

What is this price? Basically, it will be like this: Those who are able physically and mentally to work will do so. If you have a job/profession at the time that the OA takes over, you will continue in that job/profession. If you are drawing welfare, but are physically able to work, you will work. Personal freedoms to come and go as one pleases world-wide will not change. Basically, the OA doesn't care what people do to amuse themselves, entertain themselves, etc., as long as they are working and contributing to the society as a whole. But there will be zero tolerance of any act that hurts/harms another. Crimes against another or against society will be met with the death penalty, if such crime is of a severe nature such as murder, rape or robbery. What is now considered a felony crime will be punishable by death. What is now considered a misdemeanour crime will be punishable by imprisonment on a work farm for a number of years equal to what the OA considers suitable payback for the said crime against society. These work farms will be in the business of growing food, manufacture of clothing, textiles, etc. People sent to these farms will work for the specified time, or will be eliminated.

There will be zero tolerance for any crime that hurts, harms or infringes on the life of others. Example - a person making threatening phone calls to another will be picked up and sent to one of the work farms. A person committing a drive-by shooting will be punished with immediate death. The policing of the populous will be carried out by men/women who are already chosen and merely waiting for the time when they will go to work for the OA openly. Most are current and/or former military people who worked special ops while on active duty. These people will be responsible for seeking out those guilty of a crime. Once the person is located, they will inform that person that they are guilty of said crime and immediately put a bullet in their head. End of crime problem from that person. Should the person's crime not warrant the death penalty, these Public Security Officers will pick up the person and deliver them to the work farm. If the person resists, they will be shot on the spot. No trial, no jury, no lawyer, no Miranda rights. The Public Security Officer will have the authority to act as sole judge, jury, and executioner of the punishment that the OA declares fits the crime.

Population control will be accomplished by mandatory birth control by all people, men as well as women. Abortion will be freely available. There will be zero tolerance for child-bearing out of wedlock. The institute of marriage is looked upon with favour by the OA. There will be a limit of 2 children per couple allowed. Should one become pregnant after the 2-child limit has been reached, and despite the use of birth control, then the options will be either to have an abortion or to increase one's workload to compensate society for the burden of the extra child. Birth control and abortion will be completely acceptable in the eyes of the various religions world-wide. It will, in fact, be encouraged and mandatory under some religious doctrines. Recall VP Gore's meeting behind closed doors with religious leaders and NASA officials at the beginning of 1997.

But bringing people under control is not the only reason driving the OA, there is another. The other reason is the extraterrestrials. They are here on this planet, living and working with the OA. These ET's are helping the US with its space program and are working toward devising a plan to restore the planet's environment after the OA takes over. Their main reason for being here is to help the OA put a stop to the violent, out-of-control nature of the human race in general. Why? Because they fear us. They realised when we accomplished the first manned space flight that it was only a matter of time before we moved out into the universe. And they don't want our ways to infest their society. They are helping the OA for reasons of self-preservation of their society. They realised that we are the most violent race in the universe that is on the verge of space travel. And they don't want us spreading our warlike, violent, greedy ways to other parts of the universe and disrupting the order of their societies on other planets. They agreed to help the OA in the advancement of our technology and in the repairing of the damage we've done to the Earth's environment in exchange for the OA's co-operation in changing the ways of this world, bringing us humans into line with the societies of the other planets in the ET's sphere of control in the universe.

The OA has not taken control yet because there are forces within the existing governments of the world that are aware of their plans and oppose them. In the US, these forces are largely centred in the CIA and NSA. The CIA wants world control, but on its terms. The CIA wants to see a more communistic-type government set up on a world-wide basis. While the OA professes to believe in the maintaining of personal freedoms so long as one is a contributing member of society and not infringing on the lives of others, the CIA would rather see a world where all people are controlled in all ways, from what type of job one does to how one worships. It is the CIA/NSA/Air Force that is maintaining secrecy where the ET presence is concerned, not the OA. The Omega Agency, once it comes into power, plans to reveal everything to the people of the world. From the running of drugs to finance the Vietnam War to the presence of ET's on this world for the last 50 years or more. George Bush himself is said to have made the statement that he will personally tell of his involvement in the running of drugs to finance the Vietnam War while he was CIA director. To the OA way of thinking, the ends really do justify the means, and in the case of the Vietnam war, the running of drugs was necessary to finance the operation in that country. Therefore, it was a justified endeavour. Not one to be proud of, but justified nonetheless.

The CIA/NSA/OA all monitor the Internet closely. Especially IRC. The Net is described as the most dangerous tool in the world at this point in time because it is uncontrolled. Those who talk about these types of things or carry information about these things on their web sites are closely monitored. In "government talk", orders to "watch" someone translates into instructions to keep track of them by whatever means necessary, and if they cross the line, if they stumble upon the truth of the matter and don't keep their mouth shut, "take them out". This can be done in any way that works without drawing too much suspicion. Such as brakes on the car failing, a random victim in a drive-by shooting, a random target in a store robbery where that person just happens to be shopping at the time, etc. The determination as to whether a person needs to be "taken out" is left up to the discretion of the one doing the watching. It is, in effect, an open license to kill to protect the Omega Agency from public exposure before it has deemed the time is right for it to take control of the planet. In some cases, it is determined that the person in question would pose more of a threat if they died. In such a case, the machinery of the OA goes into action to discredit that person. Character assassination, manipulation of others so as to turn people against the person, campaigns to brand them a disinformation agent, a liar, a mentally unstable person, etc., are put into motion. This has been found to be an effective method of dealing with someone who gets to the truth and doesn't keep silent. In fact, it has been found to not only discredit the target victim but to cast a shadow of doubt and suspicion on others who may have listened to the targeted person.

This plan for the establishment of a one-world governing body, namely what is now known as the Omega Agency, has been in the works for a long time. And it is said that it cannot be stopped. Those who oppose the establishment of the Omega Agency's New World Order, and who cannot be brought into line through persuasion or manipulation will be eliminated as threats to society.

The person from which this information was obtained passionately believes that this plan is the solution to the world's problems. This person is also awaiting the start of a new job - as a Public Security Officer. This is a position this person was trained for and accepted before leaving active military service.
