PARANOMAL TIPS - HOTSPOTS

Explanations Can Be Wrong!

When investigating paranormal phenomena, researchers often stop as soon as they come up with evidence that appears to support a natural explanation. This may seem a sensible thing to do but, scientifically, it is wrong!

The explanation that the researcher has found may be right but it could be wrong! There could be other possibilities, that the researcher hasn't yet looked at, which are a better fit to the evidence. The point is that science is not concerned with any old explanation but only the correct one. If an explanation is to be scientifically useful, it should be exhaustively tested against the evidence.

BLOODY MARY

(Harrisburg, Dauphin County) Retold by S.E. Schlosser

This particular version's setting is mid-state, but it's lore that has its roots everywhere. Bloody Mary was an old crone that lived deep in the woods making her living selling herbal cures to the locals. None dared cross her, as she was supposed to be adept at dealing out curses also. The townspeople thought she was a witch. Then the village's young girls began to disappear, one at a time. The folk searched the woods, the buildings, streams and everywhere they could think of with no luck. They even screwed up the courage to see if Bloody Mary knew what happened to children. She denied any knowledge of the missing girls, but the villagers were suspicious. Bloody Mary looked younger to them. One night, the miller's daughter got up from bed and left the house. Her mother and father tried to stop her, but she tore out of their grasp and headed into the woods. Their struggle awoke the town, and the people all followed the girl. She made a beeline towards a light in the forest. At the end of the light was Bloody Mary, pointing a bright wand towards the girl to draw her to the spot. The townsfolk set on her, and one farmer had a gun loaded with silver bullets. (Farmers were ready for anything back in the day.) He fired one into the witch and they carried her back to town, where they put up a stake and burned her. As she sizzled, she spat out a curse. If anyone mentioned her name while looking in a mirror, she would come back and claim their soul. Wouldn't you know that some people actually tried that? And true to her word, Bloody Mary sprang from the mirror, tore their bodies apart and laid claim to their souls - forever.
