CRYPTO: PA Cougars

A story related from a colleague. This happened near Downingtown. He was talking to a farmer who's chickens were getting raided, one night he heard the chickens carrying on he grabbed his gun and shot what he thought was a dog in the dark. Upon walking up to it he realized it was a cougar, he immediately buried it. Two days later a game commission officer came to the home and asked the man if he had seen a cougar, the man whom just shot it and thinking he was in trouble said no. The officer said he knows it is here they had a tag on it. The man did show the officer where it was. He wasn't fined. So how can you be fined for something that doesn't exist in Pennsylvania according to the Game Commission?

What that story just told me, is that the Game Commission is putting them out there. Why else would they be tagged, rumor has it they are doing so to keep the deer herd down where it's hard to get access to hunters. Makes sense, getting the deer herd down is all about money. We have way too many deer to get our trees certified. Certified trees get a lot more money than non-certified. Look it up, hunters have been complaining about this for years. This means that the Game Commission is knocking down the deer herd to unheard of numbers.

PENNSYLVANIA LEGENDS

The Sayre burial mounds were found to contain the skeletons of several humanoid creatures seven feet tall, with horns on their heads. They were discovered there in the 1880s. Estimates place their burial at around 1200 A.D. The bones were found by a Pennsylvania State Historian, a Presbyterian dignitary, and two professors who were investigating the burial mounds. Some skeletons were sent to the American Investigating Museum, a forensic institution in Philadelphia. Those were alleged to have been stolen or misplaced...
