PENNSYLVANIA LEGENDS

GRANDVIEW CEMETERY (Yoder Hill, Cambria County) Built in 1885, this cemetery's claim to fame is that it's the final resting place of many of the Johnstown Flood's victims. Located at the former site of the Cambria Iron Company, Grandview Cemetery is also home of the "Unknown Plot", where 777 unidentified bodies recovered from the disaster are interred. There's a memorial there in their honor, but that doesn't seem to give them peace. Their spirits allegedly haunt the grounds, and their voices can be heard crying for help.

HOMER CITY LOGGING ROAD (Indiana County) In a house on an unnamed logging road, the story goes that a man went berserk and killed his family - son, daughter, mother and grandfather. Then he killed himself. They were buried in a small cemetery on a hilltop by the house, which eventually burned to the ground. If you ever find this spot and start up the slope towards the unnamed cemetery, the killer will rise from his grave in the form of a green light and chase you back down the hill.

LOST CHILDREN OF THE ALLEGHENIES (Spruce Hollow, Bedford County) On April 24, 1856, Joseph and George Cox wandered away from their cabin. They were only 5 & 6, and 150 people fanned out through the dense Blue Knob looking for the children. Within days, 1,000 people were involved in the search. But after 10 days, it began to look fruitless. Had they drowned? Were they kidnapped? Did a wild animal get them? Some even suspected the parents. They had to tear up their floor to prove that they hadn't buried their sons. In early May, farmer Jacob Dibert had a nightmare - he saw the brothers lying together, dead, and the area was etched clearly in his mind. He had the dream again, and told the Cox's brother-in-law Harrison Whysong the story. Whysong was skeptical, but recognized the area that Dibert had described. They went there, and the young bodies were found, just where Dibert had predicted. They had died only days earlier. To commemorate the deed, the people of Pavia Township built a monument at the spot the brothers were found. They were buried in Mt. Union Cemetery. It's said that their lost spirits still roam the woods, trying to find their way home.
