PENNSYLVANIA LEGENDS

Chadds Ford Township

This creepy area just north of the Delaware border is so infused with ghostly tales that M. Night Shymalan filmed his 2004 horror movie, "The Village" in a nearby field. Rumors state that a white house hidden in the woods on Devil's Road, officially named Cossart Road, was home to a wealthy, incestuous family called the DuPonts, who resorted to inbreeding in order to keep their fortune within the family. "The Cult House" was used as a place to perform incestuous marriages and as a place to hide deformed offspring. The trees in the area are dramatically bent away from the house, as if they are trying to escape. Piles of animal corpses have been discovered in the area by visitors. Much of the strange activity around Devil's Road can be chalked up to teenage pranksters, such as a fishing line that was strung across the road at neck height.

Williamsport PA

Wildwood Cemetery has two sides-- a good side and a bad side. On a clear night, legend says that you can see fairies on the good side, while the bad side is populated by ghoulish creatures including a shrieking banshee and many individual tombs from which you can hear voices and banging sounds. There is a statue who cries and changes position by night that can be seen from the roadside. It is said that a retired fireman who was terrified of being buried alive designed a large mausoleum here for himself and his family that could be opened from the inside, but not the outside. At night, they are said to come out and play.

Fayette County

CHaintown (Dawson, Fayette County)

Back in the day, it's said that when a prisoner got too weak to work on the chain gang, the law took them to Chaintown, and shot them. The spirits of the prisoners supposedly still haunt the area. It's located across the tracks and under a RR trestle off Chaintown Road.
