NEW YORK, Wednesday.

A “Flying Saucer” has been found on a ranch near Roswell, near Mexico.

This was announced by the United States Army Air Force amid a welter of controversy surrounding reports from at least 40 different States over the past week that flying discs or “flying saucers” have been sighted in the skies above the United States.

Official security is being maintained about the disc now in possession of the Army, but Lieut Warren Haught, Public Information Officer of Roswell army airfield, announced that the find had been made some time last week:

The disc has been turned over to the

The disc has been turned over to the airfield through co-operation of the Sheriff's office and following an inspection at Roswell airfield has been "loaned" by the intelligence officer at Roswell airfield to headquarters.

No further details have so far been given.

In Washington later Brigadier General Roger Ramey said that the "battered object which previously had been described as a flying disc," near Roswell was being sent by air to the Army Air Force's research centre at Wright Field, Ohio.

General Ramey, who is now commander of the 8th Air Force at Fort Worth, Texas, received the object from Roswell, and telephoning Army Air Force Headquarters in Washington, described it as "of flimsy construction almost like a box kite."

He did not indicate the object's size but said it was "apparently some sort of tin foil."
