THE PILOT WHO GOT TOO CLOSE

ONLY one man came too close to a "Flying Saucer." He died.

Captain Mantell, of the U.S. Air Force, chased a flying disc up above the clouds in his fighter and reported to the ground by radio-telephone that he would follow it to 20,000 feet.

That was the last that was heard from him. The wreckage of his plane was found over a wide area. Strange markings were on fragments of the metal wreckage.

The occurrence took place on January 7, 1948, over Godman Air Base, Fort Knox, Kentucky (where the world's greatest gold hoard is buried.)

the "Flying Saucer." This one was a huge disc, 500 feet across. It was shooting out pulses of red flame. The story is authentic. The whole air station saw the "thing."

That is one incident from the amazing and fascinating report on "Flying Saucers" by noted world scientific writer Gerald Heard, which begins on Page five of the "Brisbane Telegraph" next Monday.

You cannot afford to miss this series.
