

Alien life on the farm

I tuned in for a close encounter with A Country Practice the other night only to discover that life on the farm was in uproar over a flying saucer.

This seems to indicate the serial has taken a turn for the worse.

I was willing to accept a sulking pig that hogs the spotlight, or even a police sergeant who thinks he's one of the Marx Brothers, but little green men in Wandin Valley is going beyond the pale.

It might be okay for those who believe in unidentified flying objects or even men with one eye and three legs.

Such as Kevin Arnett, resident flying saucer expert on the Don Lane

Show who has probably already beamed himself into Wandin Valley for a full report on these mysterious goings-on.

As for me, I am too down to earth to give these matters any serious thought.

thought.

However, I have to confess that when sufficiently aroused I have been responsible for despatching a few unusual flying objects of my own, usually in the direction of the television screen.

The most recent was a partly eaten pizza, which I am proud to report was a direct hit.

Come to think of it, the pizza took off the night the flying saucer landed in Wandin Valley.
