In the early hours of December 31, 1978 a television crew, which included the author, filmed unidentified flying objects while aboard an Argosy aircraft off the New Zealand coast.

Their sightings were confirmed by ground-based radar stations and the experienced crew aboard the aircraft. At one stage the lights performed aerobatics and were later calculated to be travelling at 16 kilometres a second.

When analysed by computer the film was assessed as authentic with the objects on it having definite shape, form and varying levels of brightness. It created a sensation both here and in the United States.

An honest and sincere story by a man who obviously suffered both physically and mentally by revealing what he encountered. Recommended to both sceptics and believers.
