Visual Information = Low: Only a few drawings of things the author has seen in his RV sessions.

Joe McMoneagle, author of Mind Trek and probably the most respected remote viewer, turns his skills to practical concerns: predicting the future. About half of this book consists of specific predictions for the next millennium. We approach this book with considerable skepticism. While there is a lot of intriguing evidence, the reliability of remote viewing is far from proven, and believing in this book requires a major leap of faith. However, the book turned out to be much more interesting than we thought it would. While the supermarket tabloids are full of outlandish predictions that never come true, McMoneagles are very plausible. Much of it reads like a statistical abstract. (E.g. "By 2020, the average house [in America] with two adults and two children will not exceed 1250 square feet." -- a prediction we disagree with, given the growing popularity of telecommuting from remote locations.) Even if McMoneagle has no special psychic gift, we find this book fascinating because it at least gets us thinking about the future and what it will realistically bring. There aren't many surprises in McMoneagles view of the future, and that is one of the things that makes the book so appealing. It is, for the most part, a straight-line projection of current growth that requires only intelligence, not psychic skills.

The first part of the book discusses remote viewing in general, a provides answers to two of the most popular questions asked of psychics: the identity of Jesus and the solution to the Kennedy assassination. Since these theories are as unprovable as any other, we brush them off and go straight to the predictions. Some random samples:

- "By 2010, a pill will be available to men that prevents pregnancy in women."
- "It is likely that civil war will break out in both Yemen and Djibouti before the year 2000." (A prediction that can be evaluated soon.)
- Polygamy will be permitted in all 50 states by 2040.
- Large portions of major U.S. seaboard cities will be abandoned by 2050 due to rising sea levels.
- World population will exceed 10 billion by 2050.
- Formal contact with alien beings will take place sometime between 2075 and 2077.

Predictions are organized by topic and give a broad overview of life in the 21st Century. Regardless of where McMoneagle gets his theories, they will give you the framework for developing your own. -- Glenn Campbell
