Marree man is disappearing into the desert

The Marree man is fading away. Just as it materialised mysteriously in July, the 4km-long figure etched in the desert is being reclaimed by nature.

The figure of a naked Aborigine carved into a remote plateau 60km west of the tiny outback town of Marree stirred worldwide focus but no-one is any closer to discovering who ploughed the figure.

The desert is slowly obliterating the man and, within a year, little is likely to remain. Unusually heavy rains in the weeks after the figure was first discovered have fed grasses and bushes. Warmer weather has cut the number of tourists to the area, about 700km north of Adelaide. And scenic flights from Marree to the site ended last week.

Maree locals still claim they have no idea who created the figure, although high-tech surveying equipment would have been needed to carry out the task. Local businessman Ray Goss said: "I don't know who did it and no-one else seems to have any idea."
