Copyright Information

The Area 51 Research Center asserts copyright on most documents on our website that we produced ourselves. This includes text, graphics, page indexes and software written by Glenn Campbell or anyone under the paid employment of the Area 51 Research Center. It also includes the graphic design of our pages.

We do not claim copyright on any documents or passages stored on our server that we did not directly produce ourselves (although the author might).

It is not our intent to restrict reasonable use of any information we produce, and we hope to continue making all of our files available on the web free of charge. Our main aim in asserting copyright is to prevent others from copying our original work and claiming it as their own. Our second aim is to retain control over our files so they can be easily changed at a single location.

These simple rules apply:

1. You are free to link to any of the documents on our server from your own web pages. We encourage it, and no permission or notice to us is required. However, you may not copy our original documents and redisplay them on your own server without permission. (Since they are already available immediately on the web, there is rarely any reason to do so anyway.)
2. Likewise, you may print out any of our original documents for your own personal use, but you may not reproduce them for others without our permission. (Common sense applies here: If you make only two or three copies for friends, we probably don't need to know about it.)
3. Consistent with copyright law, we do not object to reasonable quotation of short passages of our work in the context of a review or analysis, as long they are properly attributed to us. However, we would object to your quoting of long passages simply to avoid doing your own work.

Our interests are simple: We have worked hard to produce this database, which we make available free to everyone. At least we should be allowed to take credit for our own documents and control how they are modified.
