Hello Errol and All,

Sorry to resurrect this old post. I had marked it for comment at the time.

If it were not for a constant stream of rumors, where would these junior James Bonds be? We supposedly have a test of a Top Secret device, but here are the pilots talking in the "clear." Since every radio in the military now has an encryption device, the incident as described is highly unlikely. Even if they were talking in the "clear" does it seem logical to refer to something by a supposedly highly classified name?

It seems that the more unlikely a story, and the more leaps of faith required, the more ready people are to believe it.

My question is why bother?
