As I already relayed to Pam privately, this is an ongoing project. I happen to have a copy of earlier draft. The bibliography has gone way beyond this draft. The collection phase never ends. There are constantly new items turning up. Most of Greenwood's work is now focused on small scientific journals, company magazines and 1950s and 1960s men's magazine. (Some of which had surprising articles such as interviews of Project Blue Book officers after they retired.)

The problem here is of one time. The bibliography should probably be a computer database that can be updated periodically. However, then you have the problem of knuckle drilling the data into the database. This type of work has far less appeal than the latest adventures of the "rebel reptilians." So demand will be low and support for producing such items almost non-existent.

I wouldn't look for this bibliography any time soon.
