I wonder what he really thinks?

Thanks for posting this.

One of my favourite luna(tic?) stories goes back to the 10th anniversary of the Apollo 11 moon landing. A national radio program, 'The Science Show', invited listeners to send in comments on what the moon landing meant to them. One gentleman's contribution was particularly interesting.

He claimed that as he sat up in early hours, waiting for Neil Armstrong to step down from the LEM, in the corner of the TV screen he saw an object roll into view. A moment later he heard a loud expletive uttered in an American accent. As he watched a bare arm reached into shot and removed an empty Coca-Cola bottle. A-ha! Right then he realized that the moon landing was all a hoax! Man never went to the moon, he told us, because "They" would never permit it. In fact, "They" barely tolerated astronauts in orbit, and should NASA or the Russians ever venture out of Earth orbit "They" would deal with them. (Yes, I checked the calendar. The program was not broadcast on April 1st.)

Unfortunately we were never told who "They" were, or why no video of the Coke bottle retrieval was ever found. More importantly, we were never told why anyone bothered to mic the lunar set so we'd be able to hear the swearing of the technician in the first place.

While a lot of people will accept the views of the JPL expert you've quoted, there'll still be those who'll see "fakery" in the moon landings -- not to mention Coke bottles rolling along the lunar surface.

Thanks,
John "Houston, Tranquility *burp!* Base Here"
