Don't be so hard on yourself, Pat. You've really been a big help so far!

RE: Mars Rock

Aren't there zillions of chunks of many planets randomly flying around our solar system? Aren't a few of them bound to crash into Earth from time to time? At best, it's just one very lucky rock caught up in an event that's statistically bound to happen sooner or later. I don't know if I'd call that 'navigation'. BTW, what's so 'un'natural about NASA (all obvious jokes aside)?

>I tend to think of the universe as a living thing.

Are you attempting to anthropomorphize the universe or do they practice a lot of animism down there in Texas? You can't rally the masses by trying to convince them that a rock is an alien. They want extraterrestrials that they can relate to, like John Tesh or the Chupacabras! If you want to know the universe, stare at an egg without blinking for 30 to 60 minutes. You'll know it when you get there ;-)

Perhaps Hale Bopp's enigmatic traveling companion is a Tums. Maybe they aren't the antacid itself, but simply promotional eye-grabbers like those banner-pulling planes at the beach. We've been bombarding them with commercials for so long, they must think that's the way we communicate.
