When I wrote, 'but proposed little that could be tested', I think you misunderstood.

Rather than read about topographical (read: mathematically theoretical) constructs that can become resonating circuits (LC; from Inductor(L)/Capacitor(C)), and _may_ produce field structures (the 'field' being a set of abstracted point sources to provide a model of potentials in _any_ sphere of science), I was actually asking for a test to prove the existence of such.

Proving the hypothesis with exemplars, so to speak.

Apologies for the brackets, but I have an aversion to the way some things sound without explanations. Bull*it baffles brains, you know? <wink>

Foundations of Physics, 6:4, 1993
Phys. Rev D, 43:457, 1991
Phys. Rev B, 46:5489, 1992
Phys. Rev D, 15:2047, 1977

That's the basis, although I'm not quoting most of the papers I have here.

If you take a look, there is mention of a many particle system, which could match yours.

>then >the reason will be found to be vector excitation and that >is induced gravitational effect, and NOT sheilding.

Perhaps, but then you're supplying answers before the tests have been completed. I recall a Philip Klag...no, Klash...Erm, Klass? Doing the same closed minded rubbishing of stuff before it became public domain.

>There is a vast difference in 'saying' and knowing.

And you 'know', right?

So why is your stuff on a web page and not Phys Rev?

>> Is that person you see when you look at 'yourself' in a mirror, you? The point is... Suppositions are a virtual image of the mind. Reality cannot change at all for it is real. The mind, on the other hand, does change. <<

Pat, weasel words. What I see in the mirror is a collection of interpreted images that may or may not be me. However, it's useful for squeezing zits and trimming the beard.
