Same here. A couple of years ago I was set upon by several rabid ETH supporters because I mentioned the statistical concurrence between geomagnetic activity and subsequent UFO sighting reports. Not wanting to be gang-mugged by these frisky followers of aliens <grin> I casually mentioned that maybe the alien propulsion system caused some geomagnetic activity in certain areas...

For all I know that may even be true...

The only thing we presently know is that there is a reliable, statistically significant, and very interesting concurrence.

My personal opinion is that geomagnetic activity probably does explain the great majority of simple, short-duration, non-descript DDs and NLs. Which is fine anyway since by definition these simple, short-duration and non-descript DDs and NLs don't look good in a high-detail multi-observer database and (hopefully) aren't the stuff we want to explain/understand first.

I should also point out that the best UFO flaps on record are probably not in any way connected with geomagnetic activity: Gulf Breeze, Belgium, Bentwaters, the 1947-era, Husdon Valley, (and others I can't remember right now).

> And, John... Is your abduction insurance paid up? :)

You bet. As Duke would say, "Come and get some."

> Watch your... uh... dietary habits!

Hahaha!
