

least two metres thick would be needed. Yet the walls of the Lunar Landers which took astronauts from the spaceship to the moons surface were, said Nasa, "about the thickness of heavy duty aluminium foil".

How could that stop this deadly radiation? And if the astronauts were protected by their space suits, why didn't rescue workers use such protective gear at the Chernobyl meltdown, which released only a fraction of the dose astronauts would encounter? Not one Apollo astronaut ever contracted cancer - not even the Apollo 16 crew who were on their way to the Moon when a big flare started. "They should have been fried," says Rene.

Furthermore, every Apollo mission before number 11 (the first to the Moon) was plagued with around 20,000 defects a-piece. Yet, with the exception of Apollo 13, Nasa claims there wasn't one major technical problem on any of their Moon missions. Just one effect could have blown the whole thing. "The odds against these are so unlikely that God must have been the co-pilot," says Rene.

Several years after Nasa claimed its first Moon landing, Buzz Aldrin - "the second man on the Moon" - was asked at a banquet what it felt like to step on to the lunar surface. Aldrin staggered to his feet and left the room crying uncontrollably. It would not be the last time he did this.

"It strikes me he's suffering from trying to live out a very big lie," says Rene.

Aldrin may also fear for his life. Virgil Grissom, a Nasa astronaut who baited the Apollo programme, was due to pilot Apollo 1 as part of the landings build up. In January 1967, he hung a lemon on his Apollo capsule (in the US, unroadworthy cars are called lemons) and told his wife Betty: "if there is ever a serious accident in the space programme, it's likely to be me."

Nobody knows what fuelled his fears, but by the end of the month he and his two co-pilots were dead, burnt to death during a test run when their capsule, pumped full of high pressure pure oxygen, exploded.

Scientists couldn't believe Nasa's carelessness - even a chemistry students in high school knows high pressure oxygen is extremely explosive.

In fact, before the first manned Apollo flight even cleared the launch pad, a total of 11 would be astronauts were dead. Apart from the three who were incinerated, seven died in plane crashes and one in a car smash. Now this is a spectacular accident rate.

"One wonders if these 'accidents' weren't Nasa's way of correcting mistakes," says Rene. "Of saying that some of these men didn't have the sort of 'right stuff' they were looking for."

Nasa wont respond to any of these claims, their press office will only say that the Moon landings happened and the pictures are real. But a Nasa public affairs officer called Julian Scheer once delighted 200 guests at a private party with footage of astronauts apparently on a landscape. It had been made on a mission film set and was identical to what Nasa claimed was they real lunar landscape.

"The purpose of this film," Scheer told the enthralled group, "is to indicate that you really can fake things on the ground, almost to the point of deception." He then invited his audience to "come to your own decision about whether or not man actually did walk on the Moon".

A sudden attack of honesty? You bet, says Rene, who claims the only real thing about the Apollo missions were the lift offs. The astronauts simply have to be on board, he says, in case the rocket exploded.

"It was the easiest way to ensure Nasa wasn't left with three astronauts who ought to be dead," he claims, adding that they came down a day or so later, out of the public eye (global surveillance wasn't what it is now) and into the safe hands of Nasa officials, who whisked them off to prepare for the big day a week later.

And now Nasa is planning another giant step - project Outreach, a 1 trillion dollar manned mission to Mars. "Think what they'll be able to mock up with today's computer graphics," says Rene Chillingly.

"Special effects was in its infancy in the 60s. This time round will have no way of determining the truth."

Space oddities

- Apollo 14 astronaut Allen Shepard played golf on the Moon. In front of a worldwide TV audience, Mission Control teased him about slicing the ball to the right. Yet a slice is caused by uneven air flow over the ball. The Moon has no atmosphere and no air.

- A camera panned upwards to catch Apollo 16's Lunar Lander lifting off the Moon. Who did the filming?

- One Nasa picture from Apollo 11 is looking up at Neil Armstrong about to take his giant step for mankind. The photographer must have been lying on the planet surface. If Armstrong was the first man on the Moon, then who took the shot?

The pressure inside a space suit was greater than inside a football. The astronauts should have been puffed out like the Michelin Man, but were seen freely bending their joints.

- The Moon landings took place during the Cold War. Why didn't America make a signal on the move that could be seen from earth? The PR would have been phenomenal and it could have been easily done with magnesium flares.

Text from pictures in the article

Only two men walked on the Moon during the Apollo 12 mission. Yet the astronaut reflected in the visor has no camera. Who took the shot?

The flags shadow goes behind the rock so doesn't match the dark line in the foreground, which looks like a line cord. So the shadow to the lower right of the spaceman must be the flag. Where is his shadow? And why is the flag fluttering? How can the flag be brightly lit when its side on to the light? And where, in all of these shots, are the stars?

The Lander weighed 17 tons yet the astronauts feet seem to have made a bigger dent in the dust.

The powerful booster rocket at the base of the Lunar Lander was fired to slow descent to the moons service. Yet it has left no traces of blasting on the dust underneath. It should have created a small crater, yet the booster looks like it's never been fired.

People have been enjoying an extra special moment after scientists added a second to the clocks.

Time came to a brief "standstill" at 1 am on Tuesday to allow atomic clocks which keep the earth's official time to be re-synchronised with astronomical time.

"The earth has been running too slowly" explained Martine Feissel, boss of the International Earth Rotation Service.

UFO link as cows are mutilated

By Murray Davies

The dead cow was lying in the middle of a perfect circle in a field.

It's head was twisted up in the air with the bottom jaw and tongue cut out. The sex organs had been removed and the naval cut out in a circle.

But despite all that there was no blood on the ground or the animal.

"People have been reporting UFOs in the area," said Sheriff C J Richards, of Cochran County, Texas, after finding the carcass in March 1975. "They all tell the same story.

"The spacecraft is the width of a two lane highway. Its round and looks like the colour of the sun with a blue glow around it.

"When people see this thing, two or three days later we hear about mutilated cows."

This is just one of a string of unexplained animal mutilations in the southern states of America stretching back to 1967.

They continue even to the present day.

Local people dismiss government claims that the wounds were caused by wild animals.

"If it is predators, then we have predators with super powers," said New Mexico police officer Gabe Valdez.

"It is hard to believe predators can pull a steers heart out through a small hole in his neck. And I have seen that."

The incisions display advanced medical knowledge.

A clue to the reason for the mystery was given by Judy Doraty, who witnessed an animal mutilation.

Under hypnosis it was revealed that she was abducted late one evening in May 1973 while she was driving home from playing bingo in Houston, Texas.

She saw a light in the sky. A carf was being drawn up in a beam.

She was taken into the spacecraft where aliens told her they were stationed on earth and were working for the betterment of mankind which was destroying itself through pollution.

They were studying the reproductive system of animals to find the extent of contamination.

It was only in the Eighties that scientists began to discover that humans and cattle share many genetic similarities.

Did rats from space down TWA Flight 800?

By Charles Oulton
Science Correspondent

A freak accident involving a canister of rats launched from space may have caused last year's TWA crash off the coast of New York, killing all 230 passengers and crew.

The latest, and most bizarre, theory to be examined by accident investigators claims the container - travelling towards earth at 800 mph - punctured the aircraft's central fuel tank, causing an explosion.

The FBI found no evidence to support its theory that a bomb caused the crash and eventually concluded that mechanical failure had caused the fuel tank to explode after a build up of vapour.

However, no one has explained how the vapour or gas was ignited - and that is where the canister takes on it intriguing significance.

The Space Shuttle Columbia launched a capsule containing the canister before it returned to earth on July 7 last year after a record 17 day mission. Scientists hoped to examine the animals to test the impacts of space travel on bone marrow.

When the capsule re-entered the earth's atmosphere, it was blasted open by rockets to release the canister which was fitted with a parachute. A US C130 Hercules trailed a giant net to catch the canister at 30,000ft.

But the parachute failed to open, putting the canister on a collision course with TWA Flight 800, which had taken off from John F Kennedy airport for Paris 9 minutes earlier.

The canister is said to have hit the aircraft's fuselage at 13,700ft, puncturing the near empty central fuel tank which then exploded. Seconds later, the Boeing 747 plunged into the Atlantic Ocean, watched by horrified onlookers on the shores of nearby Long Island. It was the second worst crash in American aviation history.

The new theory could explain a photograph taken by Linda Kobot, showing a mysterious, cylindrical object which seemed to be heading south west towards the aircraft.

The FBI interviewed Mrs Kobot and her husband several times and plotted a possible trajectory for the object. Although they eventually dismissed the evidence, they instructed the Kobots not to talk about it.

The canister theory could also explain radar pictures which also revealed an object resembling a missile speeding towards the aircraft.

Although the Pentagon confirmed the jet crashed near an area some times used for "air combat exercises", few people believe that it was brought down by a missile fired from the sea. A Nasa spokeswoman said: "we had nothing to do with TWA."

As rumours of the new lead circulated, a senior source close to the investigation claimed there had been a cover-up because of the severe embarrassment it would cause.

"This is a scandal being hushed up. No one has admitted losing this canister because it would anger the animal rights lobby. But if the aircraft was brought down by this canister, the truth should be told."

The growing peril of rubbish plunging to Earth

Space debris from rockets and satellites has been falling to earth for many years, posing an increasing risk to aircraft.

Almost every month, pilots report sightings of space objects, with canisters being the most regular hazards.

Although many fall safely in the sea, some land in built up areas, and tracking technology is still not advanced enough to give sufficient warning.

The seriousness of the position was recognised as early as 1964 when the international space treaty guaranteed compensation for anyone hit by objects from space.

There have been several payouts, notably by Russia to Canadian trappers after a radioactive satellite fell on their land in the Seventies. Part of the US Skylab fell into the Australian desert in 1979, and a booster rocket system nearly hit an Air India flight in 1985.

The aircraft blew up, probably as the result of a bomb. The chief accident investigator said the rocket had not caused the crash. But he added: "it is going to happen sometime."

ACKNOWLEDGEMENTS

This book could not have been written without the assistance and support of several people. John Carpenter's freely given and tireless efforts to assist me and my family in finding answers to an overwhelming mystery can never be repaid. Without his words of encouragement along the way, the outcome would have been far different. I also want to thank his assistant, Ann Bayliff, whose kind words and sense of humor always helped put things into perspective. In this fast-paced, technological world we inhabit, we too often forget the healing power of a human gesture. At the lowest point in my search for answers last year, one gentleman with clear insight and human compassion reached out to me, and turned my life around. That gentleman was Budd Hopkins, and the memory of his hug at a time when I needed it most will remain with me always. Budd, I can never thank you enough for your compassionate, human gesture. I also owe a debt of gratitude to two groups in Springfield, Missouri and Little Rock, Arkansas. The support and understanding offered by many individuals was of inestimable value, and I appreciate all of you more than words can say. I particularly want to thank Lucius Farish and Kandy Turner in Little Rock, and Tom Strand and Susan and Duane Bedell in Springfield, Missouri.

I thank Jack and Mary, our close friends, for listening to me without judging, and for being there throughout the last year. Friendships such as that are rare, indeed. I also wish to thank my friend and co-worker, Linda, for believing me, and for helping me get over the post-abduction "blues."

My family is, and always will be, one of the most important facets of my life. I love you all, and if I had the adventure to live over, I would still want to relive it with each of you. And to my husband-- if we have more than one life to live, I hope to live them all with you.

THIS BOOK IS DEDICATED TO THE FOLLOWING: To the aliens, whatever they are. Without them, there would have been no need to write this book. To the brave souls who have risked their reputations and livelihood to search for answers to the mystery. And to the intrepid human being who someday finds the answer to the most profound mystery the human race has ever encountered. I know you're out there somewhere

A NOTE TO THE READER: The people and events depicted in this book are real. Due to the sensitive nature of the events recounted within, pseudonyms have been used throughout, except in the case of well-known personages.

FOREWORD

Twenty years had passed. The memory of many events had been dulled by the passage of time and accumulation of new experiences. Except one in particular. One nagging peculiar event in which Lynne and her mother lost over an hour of time together in a mysterious shared period of amnesia while driving a familiar route to their home. Although medically unlikely, they lost and regained conscious awareness at the same moment. They found themselves going the wrong way on an entirely different and unfamiliar road. Neither could explain how they had driven to this area without either of them knowing it. No explanation offered to them had ever been satisfactory. If it had not been for their brief observation of a strange silver "airplane" with no wings, no tail, and no windows, they probably never would have made any connection with the subject of UFO's.

Daughter Lynne was not looking for an exotic experience or an upheaval in her life. It had not been the only unusual experience in the background of her family, but Lynne always attempted to find sensible explanations. She just wanted to unlock this period of missing time so that the logical explanation for their experience could finally be learned and understood. She knew practically nothing about UFO abductions. Her mother did not even want to know anything about such a bizarre subject and certainly had no interest in any hypnosis sessions. What they finally learned "explained" what apparently took place during their amnesia, but was an amazing and unexpected tale of an encounter with other-worldly beings which they described independently with incredible similarity in details and feelings.

When an alleged UFO abduction contains multiple participants, the potential for understanding the phenomenon greatly increases because one is no longer dealing with a recalled experience just from within the boundaries of one individual's mind. With two or more persons involved, the likelihood of a shared hallucination or delusion greatly diminishes. Specific matching details provide much difficulty for explanations of confabulation and fantasy. Innocently fabricated "false memories" or psychological representations of repressed sexual trauma would fail to account for the independently reported scenarios which match each other. If repressed sexual trauma were the source for an individual's claims, then the resulting creation would be an intricate and symbolic tapestry of that individual's personality, history, psychodynamics, life experiences, and perspective -- not an account matching with great accuracy to another person's private recollections. If these reports are hoaxes, then one could expect the incidents to be recalled with identical details and very few or no differences or changes. However, people recalling simultaneous UFO abductions tend to report a set of experiences that contain an overlapping and correlating subset. No two persons are able to share reality in exactly the same manner due to differences in attention, perception, interpretation, and emotional predisposition.

Responses under hypnosis fail to show evidence of suggestibility or any inclination toward being led to more sensible answers. Instead, these subjects -- as have many others -- arrive at bizarre responses which unknowingly match both published and even unpublished data of which neither subject could possibly have been aware. The stories are experienced as real and told from two different human perspectives with language and emotions congruent with a genuine yet unsettling encounter with something quite beyond the normal routines of these persons. Their psychological responses are predictably upset -- a normal reaction to such bizarre beings and odd circumstances.

Experience within these pages the integrity, intelligence, humbleness, and courage of this family as Lynne bravely reveals her family's encounters with the unknown. I have thoroughly enjoyed and appreciated their strength and determination to find the truth in their lives -- no matter what incredible paths they needed to explore. Open your mind to the possibilities and humbling awareness that we are not alone.

INTRODUCTION

Little did I realize on that fateful day in February of 1992 that I was embarking on a journey of discovery that would forever alter the world in which I lived and my perception of reality. With one small step, I entered a "Forbidden Zone" of "missing time," alien abduction, and potential genetic experimentation--a world inhabited by UFOs and their occupants.

What follows is a chronology of over a year in that journey. My fellow travelers include my spouse, family members, friends, and co-workers--for I discovered that the phenomenon was not limited only to my experiences, but had also invaded the lives of those I love and care about.

This is a true story of alien intrusion into human lives. But, even more than that, it is a story of human dignity and the ability to achieve victory over adversity, regardless of the form that adversity may take. ---D.L.B.

CHAPTER ONE

In early February 1992, my eyes were drawn to a book on one of the shelves at a local bookstore. In large, bold type, the title proclaimed Missing Time. Written by Budd Hopkins, it purported to contain stories of persons who had experienced a peculiar form of amnesia relating to missing periods of time, and associated these amnesiac periods with possible alien abductions. Because my mother (Frances Meadows) and I had shared a "missing time" experience twenty years prior to that, I purchased the book, thinking that perhaps it might contain some interesting and unusual ideas. I was hardly prepared for the shocking revelations within the book. The similarities of those stories to the experience we had shared in 1972 convinced me that I should attempt to contact Mr. Hopkins in the hopes of obtaining additional information. On February 23, 1992, I composed and mailed a letter to Mr. Hopkins, outlining the unusual event that had occurred, and requested any possible assistance in determining what might have happened to my mother and me on a springlike day twenty years before.

Several weeks passed after I mailed the letter, and realizing that it could be a lengthy interval before possibly receiving an answer, I decided to pursue some other avenues that might give me the insight I was seeking. My husband Kevin and I and a few other family members had attended a public meeting of a UFO Discussion Group located in Little Rock, Arkansas, in early February, and while there I was told about John Carpenter, the Mutual UFO Network's (MUFON) Director for Abduction Research. Upon contacting him by telephone, we found he would be hosting a public lecture in Springfield, Missouri, on March 14. This appeared to be an excellent opportunity to meet him, so we attended the lecture, and following its adjournment, found he would be attending the annual UFO Conference in Eureka Springs, Arkansas, in a couple weeks. Several of my family members, my husband, and I decided to attend the Conference, also. While there, we spoke with John casually regarding my possible shared amnesiac experience. He indicated an interest in additional information, and requested that my mother and I send this information to him separately, in order to avoid possible contamination of our memories. We complied with his cautions, and mailed the additional data to him in early April. After a thorough review of the information, he informed us that if we wanted to pursue answers, he would assist us through use of hypnotic regression. The first session was set for April 25, and as a precautionary measure against possible contamination, we agreed that my session and my mother's would be independent of each other's.

As I awaited the arrival of the 25th, I struggled inwardly with the knowledge that the journey I was undertaking could forever change my perceptions of life and reality, and struggled outwardly to maintain a calm I wasn't feeling. I scarcely could believe myself that aliens were abducting human beings and subjecting them to intrusive physical and mental manipulation. Yet here I was, about to embark on a path that would force my husband, family, and friends to take a quantum leap of faith with me. The outcome of that first session would affect not only my life, but also the lives of those around me. I wasn't even sure I had the right to involve others in my search for answers, but by virtue of their relationship to me, they were going to be involved, regardless. I spent a restless night thinking about the many implications.

The morning of April 25 dawned sunny and bright, and I wore the forecast of a cloudless day like a talisman, certain that this was an omen of good tidings to come. My husband and I made the trip to Springfield, Missouri, by automobile, and met John Carpenter and Ann, his assistant, at her private office located within a multi-story brick complex comprised of professional suites, with an interior courtyard. Ann's easy-going personality and sense of humor immediately helped put me at ease as we entered her office.

Following a short, informal conference with each other, I was hypnotically regressed to the point in time, twenty years ago, when something bizarre occurred in my life that resulted in an hour of "missing time," in which events had occurred that were so traumatic to my psyche that either I, or some external force, had created an amnesia that lasted twenty years.
