Serge,

I'm glad someone brought this up. To be honest it's quite amusing to hear all the American specialists on the Belgian flap. See, I used to live in the most southern part of Holland VERY close to Belgium at the time of the flap, and me and my family had several sightings ourselves. Now I know that no one's going to say: "Oh well, if you say so and saw it..." right now ;-)

But I strongly doubt these things were made by one of our own. I suspect this for following reasons: First of all the absence of any sound. Then there is the capability of these objects to stand still in mid air, rotate around its own axis and accelerate to enormous speed at once, from a stationary position.

One of the eye-witnesses there with us, is the Head of the Eurocontrol Educational Centre, the european Air Traffic Control. We were (and still _are_) absolutely certain that whatever those things were, there weren't ours. But there's another thing that bothers me in the Secret Aircraft Hypothesis:

These objects were seen over Belgium and a few over the south of Holland. If those things were secret aircraft then why would they test-fly 'em over one of the most crowded places in Europe? We also must assume they were from the Belgian Air Force, and that also strikes me as somewhat ridiculous, with what budget would they do that? If these things were from NATO or even the USAF why in the world would Belgium spend hundred of thousands of dollars to try and intercept these things with F-16s? Or does anyone honestly think they wouldn't be briefed by NATO or the USAF?

I'm not saying that _all_ triangle sightings are therefore 'unknowns'. But the idea that _all_ FTs are man-made doesn't really hold up neither. Remember, there are triangle-sightings (and photos) from as far back as 1966. And these FTs were spotted above the USSR? Also Stealth-technology? That doesn't go for me, sorry people!
