Hi Jenny, Roy, Greg, ebk, Tim, Dennis and all other list members,

I just wanted to share another funny bone you all keep tickling. I'm one experiencer that hasn't lost her sense of humor. Picture this:

You're 12 and you've come over to my house on a Friday night to spend the night. We're going to cram for the French exam. The downstairs of my home is something from "House Beautiful" magazine, so since you've never seen my room, you expect it to be just as lovely.

I open the door to my room and what happens next makes you cover your face. You're assailed by a putrid, decaying odor that makes you gag. I say, "Don't mind my room, it's always this way. It used to bother me, but the swamp gas is something I have to live with." You'd rather leave, but after a few short minutes the odor seems to subside. Besides, your curiosity is peeked. You decide to find out what in the world caused this swamp gas odor in my bedroom.

Well, unfortunately for you, you don't have to wait long.

While sitting on the bed studying, trying to keep from noticing the green slime-covered walls and floors, you suddenly notice the outside wall to the bedroom beginning to deform and part... and what to your wondering eyes do you see?

The wall has suddenly given birth to a huge hot-air balloon and it's floated right into this bedroom swamp. The room fills with a white fog and the swamp gas odor intensifies. The balloon takes up the whole room. There's no place to run. You look over at me to see if I'm seeing the same thing.

I'm laughing and crying, bent over with tears streaming down my face.

"She must be hysterical. I must be dreaming," you say out loud.

After all, you could have fallen asleep studying. You gag and bend over the edge of the bed to throw up. It's so foggy-white you can't see the edges of the balloon, where it ends...it just goes up and up into and beyond the roof. You don't remember what happened after that.

You wake up the next morning beside me, with the sun shining in the windows.

The bedroom is painted a light sage-blue, with white and yellow daisy print accent pillows, curtains and furniture to match. It doesn't smell like swamp gas. There's no balloon in the room. It's orderly, clean and just as attractive as the rest of the house. You were dreaming, right?

You jump out of bed to go to the bathroom. Oops! You slip.

You turn and see your vomit on the floor beside the edge of the bed. You look over at me, and notice I'm wearing your pj's and look down to see you're wearing mine. How strange.

Then you begin to remember the 'dream'.

Now, this last little story is just that...a funny little story. It's not real. It didn't happen. It's made up.

What isn't funny is that the very strangeness that it imparts is the very exact strangeness that we abductees deal with when they come to 'visit'. It has elements of what really does happen.

So, when you think about this kind of strangeness, don't imagine you'll enjoy it, or wish it to happen to you or your friends and family.

Don't think that just because you don't understand it, that it didn't happen exactly like you perceived it.

Try to find out why the vomit is just where you knew it was, and decided to ignore it.

Hugs, Sue
