Hi, R=E9al!

>Another prospect that probably wasn't mentioned before...

I didn't mention it, because it basically falls into the radio category. But it certainly is a valid alternative. The drawback, however, as I understand it, is the very low bandwidth of ELF or as it is sometimes called, VLF.

As far as I know, the penetrance of VLF is based on the wavelength, not on any interaction with the earth's magnetic field.

As in the other examples I mentioned, VLF could, of course, be used to carry analog information or digital information.

Not to pick on you, R=E9al, but I don't think there is any such thing as "magnetized" light.

You shouldn't be concerned about that. Anyone on this List should be able to speak their mind, though, equally, they must expect to meet vigorous (and hopefully, informed) debate, in the event they use terms loosely, contradict known evidence, or offer an otherwise controversial proposal.

That's how the field advances.
