>I want to throw my hat in the ring for Mike and for Tesla. Tesla >is one of the most understated scientific geniuses of the >twentieth century. His ideas on ground conducted current were >revolutionary. It's what the Edison company did not want to see >happen. How can usage of electricity be measured when it can be >tapped anywhere from the earth.

>Yes Mike, it is supposed that many of Tesla's workbooks are >still being deciphered although if someone on this List has >were probably noticed by the Nazi regime.

>I wouldn't understate what Tesla has given the world in >advancements by saying; 'each time you see a transformer of a >telephone pole think "Tesla"'. I would state more in the line;

>'Each time you see a electric bill, think what could had been if >Tesla had his way. Free power.'

This forgetting that investment capital dried right up when the money men (Morgan et al) saw the implication of the kinds of individual autonomy that power delivery of that type would encourage. Oh to just do away with the wires. I'd pay for that.
